If Lepidus had not received Antony, weak and defenceless as he was, when he fled after the battle of Mutina, we should have obtained a complete victory. This infamous step, therefore, has rendered him far more odious in Rome even than Antony himself ever was: for Antony raised a war at a time when the republic was in the utmost ferment; whereas Lepidus has kindled the flames in the midst of peace and victory. We have the consuls elect* to lead our armies against him; but though we greatly depend upon their courage and conduct, still however the uncertain event of war leaves us much to fear. Be assured therefore that our principal reliance is upon you and Brutus, whom we hope soon to see in Italy; and Brutus, indeed, we expect every day. Should we have defeated our enemies, as I hope we shall, before your arrival, the authority, nevertheless, of two such illustrious citizens will be of infinite service in raising up the republic, and fixing it upon some tolerable basis. All our business, indeed, will by no means be over, notwithstanding we should be delivered from the infamous designs of our enemies,—as there are many other disorders of a different kind, which it will be still necessary to redress. Farewell.

with his head to their general.—Vell. Pat. li. 64: Appian. lii. 588; Val. Max. ix. 13.—Life of Cicero, p. 261.

LETTER XVII.

To Ampius^b.

YOUR family has informed you, I imagine, of my zealous labours to procure your restoration, as A. U. 710. I have the pleasure to be assured that they are abundantly satisfied with my services. Uncommon, indeed, as the affection is which they every one of them bear towards you, yet I cannot allow that they are more sincerely desirous of your welfare than myself. I am sure, at least, their power of assisting you in this conjuncture is by no means equal to mine. I have employed it, and shall continue to employ it, for your benefit: and I have already gained a very considerable point, which will much contribute to facilitate your return. In the meanwhile, preserve a firm and manly spirit, and be well persuaded that my good offices shall not be wanting to you upon any occasion. Farewell.

LETTER XVIII.

Plancus, Consul elect, to Cicero.

I CANNOT forbear to express, upon every occasion, the sentiments I entertain of your repeated A. U. 710. favours; though, at the same time, it is with some reserve that I indulge myself in this satisfaction. The great intimacy, indeed, which you allow me to enjoy with you, renders all formal acknowledgments of this kind unnecessary; nor would I make so cheap a return to the many important obligations I owe to you, as that of mere empty professions. I had much rather reserve the proofs of my gratitude to some future opportunity of testifying it in person; and, if I live, I will convince you, by the assiduity of my good offices, and by every instance of respect and esteem, that you have not a friend, nor even a relation, who is so warmly attached to you as myself. In the mean time, I am at a loss to determine, whether the daily pleasure I receive, or the lasting honour I shall derive, from your affectionate regard, be greater.

I find the interest of my troops has been a part of your care. It was not with any intention of advancing my own power, that I was desirous they should be distinguished by the senate, as I am conscious of having no views but what regard the welfare of the republic. My reasons were, in the first place, because I thought they deserved to be rewarded; and, in the next place, because I was desirous they might, upon all occasions, be still more attached to the commonwealth. I hoped, likewise, by these means, so strongly to fortify them against all solicitations, that I might be answerable for their continuing to act with the same unshaken fidelity which they have hitherto preserved.

I have kept entirely upon the defensive; and, though I am well apprized with how much just impatience the public wishes for a decisive action, yet I persuade myself that the senate will approve my conduct. If any misfortune, indeed, should attend our armies in this part of the world, the republic would not very soon be in a condition to oppose any sudden incursion of these rapacious traitors. As to the state of our forces, I imagine you already know that those under my command consist of three veteran legions, together with one new-raised regiment, which last, however, is composed of far the best-disciplined troops I ever saw of this sort. Brutus^c is at the head of ten legions, one of which is veteran, another has been upon the establishment about two years, and all the rest are lately raised. Thus, you see, though our army is very numerous, it is not extremely strong. The republic, indeed, has but too often had occasion to be convinced how little is to be expected from raw and unexperienced forces. However, if we had been joined either by the African legions^d, which are composed wholly of veteran troops, or by Caesar's^e, we should, without hesitation, have hazarded a general engagement. As the troops of the latter were somewhat nearer than the former, I frequently pressed Caesar, by letters, to advance; and he accordingly promised to join us with all expedition. But other views, I perceive, have diverted him from these intentions. Nevertheless, I have despatched my lieutenant, Furnius, with another letter to him, if happily it may anything avail. You are sensible, my dear Cicero, that I take an equal part with you in the affection you bear to Octavius. He has a right to my friendship, not only from that intimacy which I enjoyed with his uncle^f; but, in regard also to his own disposition, which, as far I could ever discover, is regulated by principles of great moderation and humanity. It would ill indeed become that distinguished amity, which subsisted between Julius Caesar and myself, not to look upon Octavius with all the tenderness which is due to the son of my friend, after he has been adopted as such by Caesar's will, and that adoption approved by the senate. What I am going to say, therefore, is more the dictates of concern than resentment; but it must be acknowledged, that if Antony still lives, if he has been joined by Lepidus, if their armies are by no means contemptible; in a word, all their hopes and all their attempts are singly owing to Caesar^g. Not to look farther back than to his promise of joining me: had he fulfilled the assurances he gave me for that purpose, the war would, by this time, either have been totally at an end, or driven into Spain, where the enemy could not have carried it on without great disadvantage, as that province is utterly averse to them. I am at a loss to conceive, therefore, with what view, or by whose advice, Caesar was diverted from a measure so greatly to his interest and his honour, in order to turn his pursuits towards a consulship of a few months' duration^h: much to the terror, at the same time, of the republicⁱ; and with preten-sions, too, exceedingly ridiculous¹. The remonstrances of his friends might be extremely serviceable upon this occasion, both to himself and to the commonwealth. But none of them, I am persuaded, would have so much influence over him as yours²; as there is no man who is so much obliged to you except myself: for I shall ever acknowledge that the favours I have received from you are great and innumerable. I have given instructions to Furnius to solicit Cæsar upon this subject: and if I should have that authority with him which I am sure I ought, he will hereafter thank me for my advice. In the mean time, we have a very difficult part to sustain here: as, on city into the utmost consternation and disorder.—Dio, p. 310; Appian, p. 585-6.

² Plancus chose a very improper man to dissuade Octavius from pursuing his design upon the consulate, when he fixed upon Cicero as the most likely person to prevail with him for that purpose. It appears, indeed, that Octavius had artfully ensnared Cicero to enter into his views, by persuading him that he was desirous of having him for his colleague in the consular office, and promising to leave the sole administration of it to Cicero's superior wisdom and experience. The bait was too well adapted to his vanity and ambition, to be thrown out in vain, and Cicero undertook the management of this affair upon the terms proposed. Plutarch, Appian, and Dion Cassius, all concur in giving testimony to the truth of this fact; but, as it is a fact which proves that Cicero was by no means at this juncture acting the part of a patriot, the polite apologist of his conduct has endeavoured to discredit the evidence of these historians. To this end Dr. Middleton produces the following passage from the letters to Brutus, as an incontestable proof, "that no man was more shocked at Octavius's attempt, or took more pains to dissuade it, than Cicero."—"Cæsarem—improbabilis literis quidam fallacibusque nuntius impulerunt in spern certissimam consulationem. Quod simul atque sensi, neque ego illum absentem literis monere destiti, nec accusare presentes ejus necessarios, qui ejus cupiditati suffragari videbantur; nec in senatu, sceleratissimorum consiliorum fontes aperire dubitavi." [Epist. ad Brut. 10.] Now, there seems to be the strongest reason to question either the authenticity or the veracity of this letter; because it is most certain, from one of Cicero's Philippics, that he actually did favour the earliest possible promotion of Octavius to the consulate. "Quid est enim P. C. (says he) cur eum (Octavium) non quam primum amplissimos honores capere cupimus? Legibus enim annalibus cum grandiorum ætatem ad consulatum constituebant, adolescentie temeritatem verobatur. C. Cæsar ineunte ætate docuit ab excellenti eximique virtute, progressum ætatis expectari non oportere. In hoc spei libertatis posita est; ab hoc accepta jam salus, huc summi honores et exquiruntur et parati sunt."—[Philipp. v. 17, 18.] Could Cicero, after this, without being guilty of the wildest and the weakest inconsistency, the one hand, we do not think ourselves altogether strong enough to hazard an engagement: and, on the other, must take care not to expose the republic to greater dangers by declining one. However, if Cæsar could comply with the dictates of his interest and his honour, or if the African legions should speedily join us, you may depend upon having nothing to fear from this quarter. Let me entreat you to continue your friendship to me, and to be assured that I am entirely yours¹. Farewell.

From my camp, July the 28th.

"admonish Octavius by letter against his designs upon the consulship, reproach those to their face who encouraged him in that ambitious view, and lay open the source of these traitorous counsels in the senate," (all which the epistle in question affirms that he did,) when he had himself, in the speech and in the passage above cited, made everything that his wit and eloquence could suggest in favour of Octavius's premature advancement to the consular office? Either the letters, then, to Brutus are not genuine, or Cicero, to serve a present purpose, pretended that he had acted a part which he did not. The former of these suppositions is maintained by some very learned and judicious critics, and the latter will by no means be thought improbable, if there is any weight in the several instances of the same kind which have been occasionally produced in the course of these remarks. But whichever of these alternatives be the fact, it equally concludes in support of that historical evidence for which I have been contending. In farther confirmation of which it may be observed, that Plutarch cites the authority of Octavius himself for what he affirms concerning the private agreement between Octavius and Cicero in regard to the consulate. And it is probable he took this piece of secret history from those memoirs which Octavius wrote of his own life, as it is certain that both Plutarch and Appian made great use of them in compiling their histories.—Plut. in Vit. Cicero; Appian, p. 578-9, 385; Dio, p. 519; Middleton, on the Epist. to Brut. p. 134, rem. 8; Tunstall's Observ. on the Epist. to Brut. p. 222, et Suet. in Vit. Aug. 85.

¹ Plancus, soon after the date of this letter, abandoned his colleague Decimus Brutus, and went over with his troops to Antony and Lepidus. [See r.m. * on letter 15 of this book.] About four months, likewise, from the time when this letter was written, the celebrated coalition was formed between Cæsar, Antony, and Lepidus, in consequence of which Cicero, it is well known, was sacrificed to Antony's resentment. In the last moments of his life he behaved with great composure; and it is the only circumstance in all his misfortunes that he bore with a becoming fortitude. He had, indeed, so much the less reason to complain of his fate, as it is certain that he suffered nothing more than he would have inflicted, had Fortune put Antony into his power. "Omnium adversarum (says Livy) nihil ut viro dignum erat, tulit, præter mortem: quæ, vere estimanti, minus indigne videri potuit. quod a victore inimico nihil crudelius passurus erat, quam quod quædam fortune compos ipse fecisset." [Liv. Fragm. apud Senec. Suasor. 6.] This is the judgment which the noblest and most impartial of the Roman historians has passed upon Cicero, and the truth of it is abundantly confirmed by the foregoing letters.

OF MARCUS TULLIUS CICERO
TO TITUS POMPONIUS ATTICUS,
IN SIXTEEN BOOKS.
TRANSLATED INTO ENGLISH, WITH NOTES,
BY WILLIAM HEBERDEN, M.D. F.R.S.

TO THE HONORABLE AND RIGHT REVEREND SHUTE BARRINGTON, LORD BISHOP OF DURHAM, &c. &c.

MY LORD,

In availing myself of your Lordship's permission to inscribe to you the following Letters, I shall not offend your modesty by any attempt to proclaim to the world what the world everywhere acknowledges—your Lordship's eminent virtues. I shall be content if I can hide some part of my own deficiency in the splendor of so great and good a name.

Your Lordship is well acquainted with the originals from which the following translation is drawn. But while all familiar letters must be liable to obscurity in proportion to our ignorance of the persons and circumstances, often of little notoriety, to which they allude; much more is it to be expected, that in a correspondence entertained at so remote a period, where there exist no remains of the letters on one side, and not unfrequently no record of the particulars which form their subject, many difficulties should present themselves, independent of those which are inseparable from customs and language long since gone into disuse. It is therefore no idle task to render documents, at once so curious and instructive, more extensively useful, by making them more generally understood. For whether we consider the matter or the manner of these letters, their author, or the time when they were written, they constitute in every point of view one of the most precious remains of antiquity. Cicero, as your Lordship knows, was not only the greatest orator of Rome; he was at the same time one of her wisest counsellors, and one of her best citizens. To good natural parts he had added incredible industry, and had made himself master of all the literature and philosophy of the Greeks, then considered as the only source, and, exclusively of revelation, still the brightest source, of good taste and right judgment. But while the learning of the Greek sophist was often suffered to waste itself in fruitless speculation or self-conceit, Cicero's, on the contrary, appears to have been constantly directed to the purposes of useful life, adding strength and grace to the manly powers of his mind. It regulated his judgment, and animated his exertions in the forum and in the senate, in the various and important offices which he executed with singular diligence in the republic, and likewise in the discharge of those gentler duties of courtesy and friendship, to which he seems never to have been inattentive. For so occupied was his whole life, that it may well excite our wonder how he found time to write, or to read, even a portion of those works which he composed and studied. His conduct in the height of his power, during his consulship, is universally known, as well from contemporary histories as from his own orations, which yet remain an illustrious monument of his prudence, of his diligence, of his eloquence. His administration of a provincial government is not less distinguished, and is collected chiefly from the evidence of these letters. It appears to have been every way judicious and upright, and worthy of his high character. For in a situation where other governors, removed from the danger of immediate observation, and unrestrained by the sanctions of a pure religion, had too generally given a loose to rapine, extortion, and violence, and had sacrificed honour, conscience, duty, every ornament and every virtue, at the shrine of ambition and avarice, Cicero stands almost a single instance of unshaken justice, patriotism, and moral excellence.

But it would be tedious and impertinent to your Lordship to attempt to enumerate all the particulars that made up the life of this extraordinary man. Our business is with his Letters. And it is difficult to conceive any memorials more worthy of regard than the genuine letters of such a person, addressed to a most intimate friend, to whom he opened his bosom upon all occasions without reserve, who, as he says himself, was "his associate in public affairs, his confidant in all private ones, and admitted to all his conversation and thoughts^a." They present an undisguised account of his own sentiments and feelings under a great variety of circumstances, with his opinions upon almost all the great events and great men of his time. How highly they were valued by his countrymen, we learn from the testimony of Cornelius Nepos, who mentions "the sixteen books of his letters to Atticus, from the time of his consulship to his death;" and adds, that "whoever should read them would little need any other history of those times, everything being so clearly described respecting the zeal of parties, the vices of the leading men, and the changes of the republic, that nothing remains unrevealed. And his wisdom," says he, "may well be thought to have something of divine inspiration; for Cicero not only foretold what took place during his own life, but also what we now experience he announced like a prophet^b." To Englishmen they derive an additional interest, from breathing everywhere a rational love of liberty, and dread of tyranny, called forth by the peculiar crisis in which the republic was placed, when it was about to sink for ever under the yoke of despotism. To Christians they afford occasion to cherish with more fervent gratitude those consolations and hopes of revelation, that "anchor of the soul, both sure and steadfast;" from want of which we see the wisest of the heathen world become a prey to temporal calamities, and overwhelmed with despair.

Besides the contents of these letters, the style of their composition is itself deservedly an object of admiration; a style free from all pedantry and affectation, from all levity and impertinence, perfectly easy and familiar, yet everywhere consistent with dignity and good manners; or in the words of Cicero himself, when speaking of Atticus, "the language is chaste, interspersed with polite wit, and distinguished by marks of affection^c." But these very excellences, while they enhance the value of the original letters, add in no small degree to the difficulty of a just translation. It has been my endeavour, in the first place, to give the true sense of the author; then to give it as little altered from the original as the different genius of the languages would permit; to preserve as much as possible of the Roman air, without destroying that ease which gives to epistolary correspondence its best grace; not attempting to modernise terms of civility, or to disguise old customs under new habits, but wishing rather to familiarise the reader with ancient Rome. For I considered that these letters ought to appear, not as if Cicero had written in this age and country, but as if English had been the language of Italy in his time, so that the sentiments and manners might still be Roman, the medium only changed through which they are expressed. To the letters I have added notes, which I have studied to make as few, as short, and as clear as I could, consistently with the object of rendering more easily intelligible, not only to the English reader, but to the scholar, the frequent allusions, the hints, and broken sentences which occur. And though they have not been drawn up without considerable pains in perusing and weighing the opinions of different commentators, yet I have generally thought it best to give simply my own judgment, without embarrassing the reader with my reasons.

I know not if any apology be required for having given the names of people with their Latin terminations. For what can be more absurd than an attempt to translate a mere personal designation? I have not scrupled, therefore, to write Pompeius, Antonius, &c. And it may reasonably be expected that the public taste, which is daily improving, will before long adopt this alteration from the present practice. If I have not always followed the same rule in regard to the names of places, it is because countries belonging equally to all times seem not improperly to partake of the same changes which obtain in the appellations of other common objects. While, therefore, I have preserved the names of persons unchanged, I trust I shall not be chargeable with inconsistency in adopting the English terms of Rome, Italy, and other places familiarly known in modern language.

But I have done. I have perhaps already trespassed upon your patience longer than I ought, were it not that under the cover of your Lordship's name I considered myself in some measure as addressing the public. It only remains that I thank your Lordship for affording me this public opportunity of acknowledging my deep sense of the great and undeviating kindness with which you have honoured me from a very early period of my life, and which derived originally, among many other blessings, from my dear and respected father, your Lordship has permitted to grow up with my growth into familiarity and friendship. I have the honour to be, with great gratitude, esteem, and affection,

My Lord, your Lordship's most obedient and faithful servant,

TO

BOOK I.

LETTER I^a.

(Being the fifth in Gravius's edition.)

YOU, who know me so well, may easily conceive what distress I have felt, and what a severe loss I have sustained, both in my public and domestic concerns, by the death of my relation^b Lucius. For he possessed all the engaging qualities which can arise from kindness and gentleness of manners. And I doubt not that you partake in this affliction, both from your regard to me, and because you have yourself lost in him a most accomplished connexion and friend, who was attached to you as well by his own inclination as by my frequent mention of you. As to what you say about your sister, she shall be my witness how much pains I have taken to reconcile my brother Quintus to her^c. For, as ^a It is obvious that the best arrangement of any series of letters must be that of their dates. I have therefore not scrupled to adopt this order in regard to the first eleven letters of this book, which are generally acknowledged to have been very early misplaced. At the same time, to avoid any inconvenience that might arise from it, I have, here and elsewhere, as often as the same liberty has been taken, subjoined the number of each letter as it stands in Gravius's edition. This first, in the order of time, was written in the 685th year of Rome, corresponding to the 68th year before Christ, when Cicero was thirty-nine years old.

^b Lucius Cicero was cousin-german to Marcus; the term frater, like the Greek ἀδελφός, being subject to considerable latitude of signification. See book ii. letter 7, note 7.

^c Quintus Cicero, the younger brother of Marcus, had married Pomponia, Atticus' sister.

I thought him unreasonably offended, I wrote to him in such a manner as might soothe a brother, and admonish one who was my junior, and reprove one who was in the wrong. And by the letters which I have since frequently received from him, I trust that all is again as it ought to be, and as we wish. With regard to my writing, you accuse me without reason: for Pomponia has never acquainted me with any opportunity of sending a letter; neither has it happened to me to know of anybody that was going to Epirus, nor had I even heard that you were yet at Athens. As soon as I came to Rome after your departure, I despatched the business of Acutilius, which you had intrusted to me, but it turned out that there was no need of exertion; and being persuaded of the sufficiency of your own judgment, I chose that Peduceus, rather than I, should give you an opinion by letter. For after having several days heard what Acutilius had to say (with whose manner of prosing I presume you are acquainted), I should hardly have thought much of writing to you upon the subject of his complaints, when I had not scrupled (which was no pleasant task) to listen to them. But while you accuse me, remember that I have received but one letter from you; though you have had so much more leisure for writing, and so many more opportunities of sending your letters. When you tell me that if anybody^d were offended with you, it was my business to appease him; mind what you say: I have not neglected that also. But he is strangely irritated. I have not, however, omitted anything that was to be said on your part. But how far it was to be urged, I thought it best to be determined by your wishes; which, if you will only let me know, you shall find that I have not chosen to be more forward than you would be yourself, nor shall I be more remiss than you may desire. Tadius has informed me respecting his affair, that you had written as if there was now no occasion to be uneasy, because the inheritance was secured by prescription*. I was surprised you should not have known, that in a legal guardianship, under which the girl is said to be placed, no prescription can be established. I am glad you are pleased with your purchase¹ in Epirus. I should wish, as you mention, that, as far as you can without inconvenience, you would attend to the commission I gave you²; and in such a manner as you may judge suitable to my Tusculan villa. For, after all my troubles and fatigues, it is there I find repose, where I am now daily expecting my brother. Terentia³ is affected with severe pains in the joints; she has a great regard for you, and your sister, and mother, and wishes your best health, as does my darling Tullia⁴. Take care of yourself, and continue to love me, and believe me to love you as a brother.

LETTER II.

(Græv. vi.)

I WILL hereafter give you no occasion of charging me with neglect of writing. Do you only take care that, in your abundant leisure, you are even with me. Rabirius's house at Naples, which you had already measured and completed in your mind, has been purchased by M. Fonteius for 130,000 sesteratii (£1083)¹. I wished you to be acquainted

* The term of undisputed possession, which conferred a prescriptive title among Roman citizens, was by the XII Tables fixed at two years for landed property, and one year for personal property.

⁴ Tullia was Cicero's daughter.

In order to reduce the sesteratii to English pounds, it is only necessary to divide by 180. The characters expressive of their number are usually ((1)) 1000, ((1)) 10,000, ((1)) with this, in case it should any way affect your plans. My brother Quintus seems to be disposed towards Pomponia, as we could wish, and is now with her at his estate near Arpinum, where he has with him D. Turranius, a man of excellent acquirements. My father died the 24th of November¹. This is the sum of what I had to say to you. If you should be able to meet with any ornaments of the gymnasiac kind², which would suit that place which you know, I should be glad if you would secure them for me. I am so charmed with my Tusculan villa that I feel then only satisfied with myself when I get there. Let me know all that you do, and all that you intend to do.

LETTER III.

(Græv. vii.)

ALL is well with your mother³, for whom I entertain a great regard. I have engaged to pay L. Cincius⁴ 20,400 sesteratii (£170) on the 13th of February. I should be glad if you would take care to let me have the things you have purchased and provided for me as soon as possible. And I wish 100,000, each additional pair of marks increasing the number tenfold.

The same letters H.S. likewise are used to denote sestertia, to which the figures X, &c. being added, seem to signify not only "decem," &c., but more commonly "decies," &c. the adverb being 100 times the value of the corresponding adjective.

The following table exhibits at one view the denominations of the sestertia, and the corresponding value in English money.

One thousand sesteratii	8	6	8
H.S. X (10) Dena sestertia	83	6	8
H.S. L (50) Quinquaginta sestertia	416	13	4
H.S. C (100) Centum sestertia	833	6	8
H.S. D (500) Quingues sestertium	4,166	13	4
DC, &c. Sexies (600), Septies (700), Octies (800), Novies (900).
H.S. X (1000) Decies sestertium	8,333	6	8
XX, &c. Vicies (2000), Tricies (3000), Quadrages (4000).
H.S. L (5000) Quinquages sestertium	41,666	13	4
LC, &c. Sexages (6000), Septuages (7000), Octogies (8000), Nonages (9000).
H.S. C (10,000) Centies sestertium	83,333	6	8
H.S. D (50,000) Quingenties sestertium	416,666	13	4
H.S. ((1)) (100,000) Millies sestertium	833,333	6	8

² Γυμνασιώδης, that is, such statues and other marbles as were erected in the gymnasia or public schools in Greece, and would be suitable to Cicero's favourite retreat near Tusculum, where he had built rooms and galleries in imitation of the schools and porticos of Athens, and which he likewise called by their Attic names of Academia and Gymnasium, and designed for the same purposes of philosophical inquiry.

you would consider, as you promised, how you can complete my library. All hope of the pleasure to which I look forward when I shall have come into retirement, is placed in you.

LETTER IV.

(Græv. viii.)

EVERYTHING is as we could wish at your house. Your mother and sister are held in the greatest esteem by me and my brother Quintus. I have had some conversation with Acutilius. He denies that anything had been written to him by his agent, and is surprised that any dispute should have arisen. The security which he demanded is no longer required from you. I have understood that Tadius is very thankful, and highly pleased with what you mention of having compromised the affair of his family. That friend of mine^a, who is indeed a good man, and very friendly to me, is seriously angry with you. When I know how much you regard this, I may be able to judge what pains I should take in it. I have provided for L. Cincius 20,400 sestertii (£170) for the Megaric statues. The Mercuries of your Pentelic marble with bronze heads, about which you wrote to me, already delight me exceedingly; and I should be glad if you would send them, and the other statues, and whatever else you may judge suitable to the place, and to my studies, and to your taste, as many, and as soon as possible; especially what you think proper for my gymnasium and portico; for I am transported with such a fondness for these sort of things, that while I request you to assist me, I must expect others to blame me. If Lentulus's ship is not ready, let the things be embarked in any other you please. My darling Tulliola^b is anxious for your present, and calls upon me as a surety; but it is safer for me to swear off than to pay.

LETTER V.

(Græv. ix.)

I HEAR from you too seldom, though you can much easier find people going to Rome than I can to Athens; and you may be more sure of my being at Rome than I can of your being at Athens. This letter is therefore the shorter, owing to my uncertainty; for, being doubtful where you might be, I was unwilling that this our familiar conversation should fall into strange hands.

I am anxiously expecting the Megaric statues and Mercuries about which you wrote to me. Whatever of the same kind you may have, which you think fit for my Academy, do not hesitate to send it, and trust to my purse. These sort of things are my delight. I particularly want such as are most suitable to my gymnasium. Lentulus promises the use of his ships. I request your diligent attention to these matters. Chilius asks you (and I too at his desire) for an account of the national customs of the Eumolpidæ^a.

^a Lucretius.

^b Such diminutives expressive of endearment are not uncommon in other languages, especially in Italian. Of all Latin authors, Catullus has made the most frequent use of them, and often with singular beauty.

^c The Eumolpidæ were a family of Thracian origin, conse-

LETTER VI.

(Græv. x.)

WHILE I was in my Tusculanum (this is in return for that of yours—"While I was in the Ceramicus"^a); however, while I was there, a servant sent by your sister from Rome gave me the letter which had been brought from you, and said that he was to set out the same afternoon on his return. Hence it is that I determined to write something in answer to your letter, and am compelled by the shortness of the time to write but a few lines. In the first place, I will engage to appease, or even fully to reconcile our friend^b; which although I did before in some measure, of my own accord, yet I will now set about it with more earnestness, and will urge him more strongly since I perceive by your letter how great a stress you lay upon it. But I would have you understand that he is very deeply offended. Still, as I see no serious cause for it, I have great confidence that he will be moved by a sense of what is right, and by my authority.

I should be glad to have my statues and Hermeracles^c embarked as soon as you have an opportunity, and anything else you may find proper for the place you know; especially what you think suitable to my palæstra and gymnasium. For I am sitting there while I write, so that the place itself reminds me. I commission you besides to procure some reliefs, which may be introduced into the ceiling of the ante-room; and two figured puteals^d. Take care that you do not engage your library to anybody, however eager a lover of such things you may meet with, for I reserve all my gatherings for crated to the service of the Eleusinian mysteries at Athens, τοῦ τῆν τελετὴν αὐτοῖς καταστητάμενου Εὐμολπίου Βαρβαρίου καὶ Θρακὸς ὄντος. [Lucian, Demonax, M.] What may be the exact meaning conveyed by the general term τελετὴ, it is not easy to say. It may, however, be observed, contrary to the interpretation of some commentators, that considering the secrecy always observed in regard to these mysteries, and that Cicero was himself one of the initiated, it can hardly be supposed that he would concur in any request to Atticus to reveal them.

^a Ceramicus was the name of a district in the suburbs of Athens, which among other buildings contained the Academy, whose maxims were adopted by Cicero. In this and the other letters I have adopted the Latin expressions Tusculanum, Pompeianum, &c., signifying his house near Tusculum and Pompeii.

^b Lucretius. See letter 7 of this book.

^c It is not obvious to conceive how the two figures of Mercury and Hercules, or Minerva, indicated by the terms Hermeracles and Hermathena, could be combined in one statue. May it have been a stone case surmounted with a head of Mercury, and containing an image of Hercules or Minerva? Such are described by Plato in his Συμπόσιον, where Alcibiades compares Socrates to "those figures of Silenus in the sculptors' shops which open in the middle, and exhibit images of the gods," τοῖς σελήνοις τοῖς τοῖς ἐν τοῖς ἐργολυφείοις καθήμενοις—οἱ δίχαδε διοιχθέντες φαινομένη ἐνδοθεν ἀγάλματα ἔχοντες θεῶν.—Ed. Flein. p. 1202.

^d Putealia sigillata. These are usually supposed to have been the tops of wells, resembling some marbles still found among the ruins of ancient Italy. But it does not seem very probable that wells should be made a subject of ornament, and the real design of these marbles is not clearly made out. Perhaps it should be written putealia, as it is in some editions, signifying "sculptured cases," to hold manuscripts or other library apparatus.

the purpose of providing that resource for my old age.

Respecting my brother, I trust that things are as I have always wished, and have studied to make them. There are many reasons to believe it, and not the least is, that your sister is pregnant.

As to what regards my comitia^a, I both remember that I excused you, and have long since declared this to our common friends who are expecting you. I shall not only not summon you, but shall forbid you. For I know that it is of much greater importance to you, that you should do what is to be done at this time, than it is to me that you should be present at the comitia. Therefore I would have you make up your mind, as if it were on my business that you were sent into that country. And you will find me towards you, and hear of me, in case of any success, as if it were gained, not only in your presence, but by your means. Tulliola appoints you a day: she calls upon your surety^b.

LETTER VII.

(Græv. xi.)

I ACTED first of my own accord, and have since been much excited by your two letters written to the same purpose. In addition to which, Sallustius^c has been constantly exhorting me to do my utmost with Luccius towards restoring your ancient friendship. But after all I could do, I have not only not been able to recover that good-will which he used to bear you, but not even to elicit the cause of his altered disposition. Although he speaks of that arbitration of his, and the things which before you left us I understood had given him offence, yet there is something that has sunk deeper in his mind, which neither your letters nor my assurance can so easily erase, as you can remove it in person, not only by conversation, but by your own familiar countenance; if only you think it worth while, which you certainly will if you take my advice, and act consistently with your natural kindness. You must not be surprised, if I before signified to you by letter that I hoped to find him tractable, and now appear to distrust. But it is incredible how determined his mind seems to be, and fixed in this angry mood. But this will either be set right when you arrive, or will make him very uneasy, whichever is in fault.

As to what you say in your letter, that you suppose I am already elected, you must know that nothing at Rome is so vexatious as the iniquitous proceedings against the candidates; nor is it known when the comitia will take place. But you will hear all about this from Philadelphus. I should be glad if you would send as soon as possible what you have got for my academy. Not only the actual enjoyment, but the very thought of that place delights me wonderfully. Remember not to give up your books to anybody; but keep them, as you say, for me. I entertain the strongest affection for them, as I do now disgust for everything else; for it is not to be believed in how short a time how much worse you will find things than you left them.

^a The comitia here alluded to must have been held for the election of prætors, for which office Cicero was at this time a candidate.

^b These law terms are evidently introduced by Cicero in playful reference to his daughter's expectation of a present, which Atticus had promised to send her. Some would read, "she does not call upon your surety." The difference is of little moment. See letter 4 of this book.

^c This Sallustius was a friend of Cicero's, not the historian of the same name.

LETTER VIII.

(Græv. iii.)

KNOW that your grandmother is dead from want of you^a, and from fear lest the states^b of Latium should not be steady in their duty, and should fail to bring the victims to Mount Albanus. I imagine L. Saufeius^c will send to console you upon this event. We are expecting you here in January, either from common report, or from what you may have written to others; for to me you have written nothing about it. The statues which you have procured for me are landed at Caieta. I have not seen them; for it has not been in my power to leave Rome. I have sent a person to pay the freight. I am much obliged to you for having managed this so well, and so reasonably.

As to what you have repeatedly said about appeasing our friend, I have done and tried everything; but his mind is wonderfully estranged on account of certain suspicions, which, though I imagine you have heard, yet, when you arrive, you shall know from me. Sallustius, who is here, I have not been able to restore to the place he held in his affection. I mention this to you, because he used to accuse me on your account; but he has found by his own case that he is very inexorable, and that my attention to you has not been deficient. I have engaged my dear Tullia in marriage to C. Piso, son of Lucius Frugi.

LETTER IX.

(Græv. iv.)

You raise in us perpetual expectations of your arrival. Lately, when I supposed you to be coming, we were suddenly put off till July. Now, however, I imagine, as far as you can do it with convenience, you will really come at the time you mention. You will thus be at my brother Quintus's comitia^b; we shall meet again after a long interval; and you will be able to conclude the business of Acutilius^c. For this purpose Peduceus

^a By this expression Cicero gently reproaches his friend on account of his long absence.

^b It must be supposed that this relates to some scruples and apprehensions which this old lady had expressed, and which may probably have been a subject of jest between the two friends. The ceremonies alluded to are those of the Latin festival, which used to be celebrated every year in memory of the union of the different neighbouring states of Latium. By the word Latina I understand gentes, or civitates, not mulieres; for it does not appear that women had any part to perform there.

^c This L. Saufeius appears to have been a philosopher of the Epicurean sect, who placed their chief happiness in their ease. It is upon this depends the smartness of Cicero's observation, writing to one of the same persuasion.

^b Quintus Cicero was a candidate for the office of ædile at the ensuing comitia.

^c It is uncertain what this business was. It is spoken of in the first letter of this book.

us also requested me to write to you ; for we are of opinion that it is desirable you should at length ring this affair to a conclusion. My intercession is, and has long been, prepared.

I have concluded the business of C. Macer with great and distinguished applause. And while I have done him every justice, have yet derived such greater advantage from the approbation of the people, upon his condemnation, than I could have done from any return on his part, had he been acquitted.

As to what you write to me about the Hermæna, it is exceedingly grateful to me, and an ornament proper for my academy ; Mercury being the common emblem of all schools, and Minerva be particular one of that school. I should be glad hereafter, as you say, to have you contribute as many other things as possible to the embellishment of that place. The statues you before sent me I have not yet seen^a ; they are at Formianum, where I am now intending to go. I shall transport all those things to Tusculanum. Should I ever begin an overflow, I will decorate Caieta^c. Keep your books, and do not despair of my being able to make them mine ; which if I accomplish, I shall exceed Cræsus in riches, and look down with contempt upon the houses and lands of all the world.

LETTER X.

(Græc. i.)

On my canvas, in which I know you take a lively interest, this is the state, as far as can yet be foreseen. P. Galba alone is beginning to solicit votes ; he is refused without ceremony or disguise. People think that this premature canvassing is not unfavourable to my cause, for he very generally meets with denials under pretence of persons being under obligation to me. So I hope I may derive some advantage from it, as by this means the opinion spreads of my having many supporters. I had intended to begin canvassing in the Campus Martius, at the comitia for electing tribunes, the 7th of July, at the very time when I understood from Cincius that your servant was to set out with his letter. My competitors, which seem to be certain, are Galba, and Antonius, and Q. Cornificius. I imagine you will either smile or grieve at this. To enrage you quite, there are some who even think of Cæsonius. I do not apprehend Lucilius will offer ; for he denies it, and has sworn that he is ill, and has objected his judicial supremacy. Catilina will be a certain competitor, if it is determined that the sun does not shine at mid-day^d. I imagine you do not expect me to take notice of Aufidius and Pelicanus.

Of those who are in nomination for this next

^a It may be thought singular that Cicero, who had examined such a strong passion for these marbles, should not have found time to visit them ; but it is probably accounted for by his being at this time one of the prætors, whose duties obliged him to reside in the city.

^c Caieta is probably the same as Formianum, under a different name : Caieta being a sea-port, and Formiæ the name of a town at a short distance from it inland.

^d That is, if it be determined to shut the eyes against the iniquitous proceedings, which are as clear as the meridian sun.

year, Cæsar^e is thought secure. The contest is supposed to lie between Thermus and Silanus, who are so poor in friends and in reputation, that it seems to me not impossible to bring in Curius ; but this opinion is peculiar to myself. It appears most conducive to my cause that Thermus should be returned with Cæsar ; for of those who are not the present candidates, there is nobody who seems likely to be a more powerful opponent, if he should withdraw into my year ; because he has the charge of the Flaminian road, which will easily be completed by that time. I should therefore gladly see him now Cæsar's colleague^f.

Such is the opinion hitherto formed of the candidates. I shall take care to use the greatest diligence in executing every part of a candidate's duty ; and possibly, since the Cisalpine Gaul^g has considerable weight in voting, when the forum at Rome is a little cooled from its judicial causes, I may run down in September, as a lieutenant to Piso^h, so as to be back in January. When I shall clearly have discovered the disposition of the nobles, I will write to you. The rest I hope will go smoothly, with only the present city competitors. Take care to engage for me, since you are nearer to them, that troop of our friend Pompeius. Tell him I shall not be angry with him, if he does not come to my election. So much for this business.

But there is one subject on which I am very anxious to have your forgiveness. Your uncle Cæcilius, having been defrauded of a considerable sum of money by P. Varius, commenced an action against his brother Caninius Satrius for the property, which he said he had received from Varius by a fraudulent transfer. Other creditors were parties in the same action ; amongst whom was Lucullus, and P. Scipio, and L. Pontius, who they supposed would be appointed administrators, if the goods were sold. But it is absurd now to speak of an administrator. Cæcilius requested me to support him against Satrius. Now, there is scarcely a day that this Satrius does not come to my house. His first attention is to L. Domitius ; his next to me. He was of great service to me, and my brother Quintus, in our canvasses. I am very truly embarrassed, both on account of my intimacy with Satrius, and with Domitius, on whom, above all, my present success depends. I explained this to Cæcilius, and at the same time assured him, that if the dispute lay between them two alone, I would comply with his wishes ; but that now, in the general cause of all the creditors (people especially of the first authority, who, without Cæcilius's appointing anybody in his own name, could easily maintain their common cause) it was reasonable that he should consider the obligations and circumstances under which I lie. He seemed to receive this more harshly than I could wish, or than gentlemen use to do ; and afterwards he entirely broke off the intercourse between us, which had been a few days

^f There is evidently some error in the text. I have given what appears to be the sense intended.

^g Cisalpine Gaul was the ancient name for Lombardy : those who had passed through the first magistracies in the towns south of the Po, had a right of voting in the assemblies of the Roman people.

^h These lieutenantships appear to have been fictitious offices, under the plea of which the senators of Rome used to visit the provinces with a certain degree of authority.

established. I have to beg that you will not take this ill of me, but will consider that I was prevented by common humanity from coming forward in the time of his distress against the high reputation of a friend who had exerted all his efforts and kind offices to serve me. Or if you are disposed to pass a harsh sentence upon me, you will suppose it was my ambitious views that stood in the way. But I think, even if it were so, that I should still deserve to be forgiven, considering that this occasion is no trifling one. For you see in what progress we are, and how important it is not only to retain, but to acquire the good-will of all people. I hope I have proved my case; I certainly wish it.

Your Hermathena delights me exceedingly; and it is so well placed, that the whole gymnasium derives a lustre from it, as from the sun^k. You have my best affections.

LETTER XI.

(Græc. ii.)

In the consulate^l of L. Julius Cæsar and C. Marcus Figulus, know that I have a son born, and that Terentia is going on well. No letter from you after so long a time? I before sent you a particular account of the state of my interests. I am at present thinking to undertake the defence of my competitor Catilina^m. The judges are such as we could wish, and with the full consent of the accuserⁿ. I hope, if he should be acquitted, to have him the more friendly in the business of my canvass. Should it fall out otherwise, we must bear it with patience. I have great need of your speedy arrival: for it is the general opinion that some noble^o persons of your acquaintance will oppose my success. I foresee that you can be of the greatest use in conciliating their good will towards me; therefore do not fail to be at Rome in January, as you have appointed.

[Between the eleventh and twelfth letters of this collection must have intervened a period of more than three years, during which the correspondence is interrupted, owing, as it should seem, to Atticus's having come to Rome to assist Cicero in his election, and remaining there with him through the period of his consulship.]

^k The original is a little obscure. I have expressed what I conceived to be the true meaning.

^l The Romans designated their years by the names of the consuls.

^m This is the same Catilina whose conspiracy Cicero afterwards defeated with so much applause in his consulate. Catilina was at this time charged with peculation in Africa. There is no doubt but Cicero's object was to promote his own election by the co-operation of Catilina's connexions, which were numerous, and among the first families of Rome. He however changed his mind, and did not defend him.

ⁿ His accuser was Clodius, who appears to have accepted a bribe to betray his own cause.

^o None of Cicero's ancestors having been ennobled by holding the higher offices of the state, it is on this account that he was sometimes taunted with the appellation of a "new man." The same cause excited the jealousy of the nobles towards him, whom they looked upon as an ambitious and popular upstart.

LETTER XII.

THAT Trojan woman^p is a slow business; nor did Cornelius afterwards return to Terentia^q. I think we must have recourse to Considius, Anius, Selicius^r, for the nearest relations cannot extract money from Cæcilius at less than twelve per cent.^s But, to return to my first subject: I have known nothing more shameless, more cunning, more sluggish, than her^t. "I send one of my freedmen"—"I have given directions to Titus"—mere pretexts and delays! But it may be that fortune orders things better than we ourselves; for Pompeius's forerunners tell me that he will openly propose that Antonius should be superseded; and at the same time the prætor will bring it before the people. It is an affair of that kind, that I cannot honourably defend the man with the good esteem either of the respectable part of society, or of the populace, nor do I choose to do it, which is most of all; for a circumstance has occurred, which I send to you entire, that you may see the nature of it. I have a freed-man, a good-for-nothing fellow, Hilarus I mean, the accountant, and a client of yours. Of him Valerius the intrepenter^u relates the following account, and Chilius writes me word that he has heard the same; that this fellow is with Antonius, and that Antonius, in making his exactions, gives out that a part is demanded for me, and that this freed-man is sent by me to look after the common plunder. I am not a little disturbed, though I can hardly believe it; but there has certainly been some conversation to this effect. Pray investigate the whole: inquire, learn, and, if you can by any means, remove the scoundrel from those parts". Valerius mentioned Cnæus

^p Teucris illa. The person thus designated is universally agreed to be that C. Antonius who had been colleague with Cicero in his consulate, and whom Cicero had gained by voluntarily resigning to him the valuable province of Macedonia, to which Cicero would otherwise have been appointed upon going out of office. Various conjectures have been formed about the term here applied to him, which, as it probably relates to some private understanding between Cicero and Atticus, must ever remain obscure. It seems to be a contemptuous expression, used in imitation of the Greek feminines, which were sometimes applied to men, and which Pope has thus rendered in his Homer—

"O, women of Achæa, men no more."

So afterwards [letter 14 of this book] we find Cicero using the term "filiola Curionis," meaning "the effeminate son of Curio."

^q Terentia, we know, was Cicero's wife. Cornelius was questor to Antonius, and by what follows seems to have been employed by him to deceive Terentia with false promises of repaying some money perhaps advanced by Cicero. Is this the reason of the term lentum negotium?

^r These may probably be the names of usurers.

^s Centesima. The Latin indicates one per cent.; but it is to be remembered that the Romans calculated their interest not by the year, but by the month. The calends and ides, that is, the beginning and middle of each month, being the usual times of payment.

^t I have thought it right still to preserve the original expression in the feminine, as it relates to Antonius under the character of the Trojan woman.

^u The Romans thought it a point of dignity in their public capacity always to speak in their own language, and to hear foreigners through an interpreter.

^v Macedonia, near to which Atticus resided.

Plancius as his authority for this report. I earnestly beg you will see what all this is. It appears that Pompeius is very friendly to me; his divorce of Mucia^a is much approved. I imagine you have heard that P. Clodius, the son of Appius, was detected in women's clothes at the house of Caius Cæsar, while the religious ceremonies for the people² were going on, and that he was saved, and conducted out by the hands of a servant-girl; that it is an affair of great scandal, which I know you will be sorry for. I have nothing more to tell you. And in truth I have been a good deal distressed, for Sosithens, my reader, a pleasing youth, is lately dead, which has disturbed me more than the death of a slave ought to have done. I hope you will often write to me: if you have nothing to say, say what comes uppermost. The first of January, in the consulship of M. Messala and M. Piso³.

LETTER XIII.

I HAVE NOW received three letters from you, one through M. Cornelius, which I imagine you delivered to him at the Tres Tabernæ⁴; another, which your Canasian⁵ host brought me; the third, which as you mention you gave from the vessel after the anchor was weighed: which were all letters of a master: they speak in a chaste style, are interspersed with pleasant humour, and distinguished by marks of affection. These letters might well excite me to write in return; but I have been the more dilatory from want of a trusty messenger; for how few are there who can carry a letter of any weight, without lightening it by a perusal^b! Besides this I do not always know when any one goes to Epirus; and I conceive that, having slain your victims before Amalthæa^c, you would immediately go to lay siege to Sicyon. Nor am I by any means certain when you go to Antonius, or how long you mean to stay in Epirus; so that I do not care to trust letters of a confidential kind either to Greeks^d

^a Mucia had been married to Pompeius, and was now divorced, as it is said, on suspicion of adultery with Cæsar.

² This alludes to the secret ceremonies held annually in honour of the Bona Dea, or Good Goddess, for the safety of the Roman people.

³ The consuls entered upon their office on the kalends, or first day, of January; and by their names the years were afterwards distinguished.

⁵ Canusium was a town on the road to Brundisium, by which Atticus passed to his estate at Buthrotum in Epirus.

^b As the English language permitted, I have thought it right to preserve this humble jest, which may find a place in a familiar letter.

^c Amalthæa. This is the name given to the goat fabulously supposed to have nourished Jupiter, and whose horn was afterwards made the emblem of plenty. From the latter circumstance, the word Amalthæum was adopted by Cicero to designate the library of Atticus in Epirus, rich in variety of learning. Here Cicero uses the original word, as if the sacred goat was the divinity of the place; and he means to say, that after enjoying himself amidst his books, he conceives Atticus would go to Sicyon, perhaps to claim some money due to him as renter of the tributes. See letter 19 of this book.

^d After Greece became subject to the Romans, it was or to Epirots. Since your departure some things have occurred deserving of notice, but not to be exposed to the risk of my letter's being either lost, or opened, or intercepted.

You must know then in the first place, that I was not the first called upon for my opinion^a, and that the peace-maker of the Allobroges¹ was put before me, which was done amidst the murmurs of the senate, but without any reluctance on my part; for I am thus freed from all obligation towards a perverse man²; and at liberty to maintain my own dignity in the state in spite of his wishes. And this second place of delivering my sentiments, carries with it nearly the same authority as the first, while it leaves the judgment unfettered by any obligation towards the consul. The third is Catullus; the fourth (if you wish to know that too) Hortensius. But the consul himself is of a narrow and poor spirit, an ill-natured snarler of that sort which even without railery is laughed at; ridiculous rather from his features, than his wit^b: concurring in nothing with the state; separated from all the principal people; from whom one can expect no good to the state, because he wishes it no good; and from whom one need fear no harm, because he dares not commit it. His colleague^c is very attentive to me, and a follower and supporter of the best parties. There is besides some little disagreement between them: but I fear lest that which is diseased in the state may spread further; for I suppose you have heard that, while the sacred ceremonies for the people were performing at Cæsar's house, a man came there in female dress; and when the vestal virgins had renewed the sacrifice, mention was made of it in the senate by Q. Cornificius. He was the first, that you may not suspect any of us. Afterwards the affair was, by a decree of the senate, referred to the pontiffs, and it was determined by them to be sacrilege. The consuls then, by another decree of the senate, published an indictment, and Cæsar sent his wife a bill of divorce. In this cause Piso, induced by his friendship with P. Clodius, uses his divided into two provinces of Achaia and Macedonia, of which the former included the whole of Greece proper. It appears from Cicero's Familiar Letters, [letters 4, 5, &c.] that Ser. Sulpicius, as governor of Achaia, had jurisdiction over the Peloponnesus, Attica, Boeotia, Thessaly, and Epirus: therefore Plinius calls it "Achaliam, illam veram et meram Græciam." And Pausanias says, καλοῦσι δὲ οὐχ' Ἑλλάδος, ἀλλ' Ἀχαιῶν ἡγεμόνα οἱ Ῥωμαῖοι, διότι ἐχειρόσαντο Ἑλλήνας δι' Ἀχαιῶν, τότε τοῦ Ἑλληνικοῦ προσθηκότων. [Lib. vii.] And this extended sense is to be given to the word Ἀχαια, when it occurs in the New Testament, as in Acts xviii. 12; and again, ch. xix. 31; also, 1 Cor. xvi. 15.

^c It seems to have been the custom for the consul, upon first entering into office, to call upon the consular senators for their opinion in what order he thought proper; which order was observed during the remainder of the year.

^d By this expression is to be understood Caius Piso, who had presided over the province of Gallia Narbonensis, in which the Allobroges dwelt.

^e Marcus Piso, a relation of the former, and one of the new consuls.

^b In the original there is a play upon the words facie and faciliis, which, as it is impossible to preserve in the translation, so neither would it be desirable, unless for the purpose of exhibiting a juster character of Cicero's manner towards his intimate friend.

endeavours that this indictment, which he himself prefers, and prefers by order of the senate, and for the sake of religion, may be set aside. Messala is hitherto very strenuous for measures of severity. Good men are kept away by the entreaties of Clodius; ruffians are provided; and I myself, who had been a very Lycurgus at the beginning, am daily softened down. Cato is instant and urgent. In short, I am afraid lest these matters, neglected by the good, and supported by the wicked, may be the occasion of serious evils to the republic. But that friend of yours (you know who I mean¹); about whom you wrote to me, that when he no longer dared to find fault, he began to commend) makes a show of great regard for me; salutes me, loves me, openly praises me; secretly, yet so that it is sufficiently manifest, he envies me: there is nothing kind in him, nothing candid, nothing disinterested in his politics, nothing illustrious, nothing brave, nothing liberal. But these things I will detail to you more particularly some other time; for they are not yet sufficiently known to me; nor do I care to intrust to this fellow, of whom I know nothing, a letter about things of such importance. The prætors have not yet had their provinces allotted them; the business is in the same state in which you left it². The geographical position of Misenum and Puteoli, which you require, shall have a place in my speech. I had observed that the date of the third of December was wrong. The parts of my speeches which you commend, I assure you pleased me very much; though I did not before venture to say so. But now that they have your approbation, they appear to me more truly Attic³. I have added something to the speech against Metellus⁴. The book shall be sent to you, since your kind regard for me has given you a taste for oratorical writings. What news shall I send you? what? The consul Messala has bought Autronius's house for 437 sesteria⁵ (£33,600.) What is that to me? you will say; only that in comparison with this purchase, I must be judged to have laid out my money prudently; and people have begun to understand that, in buying, it is very allowable to use the assistance of one's friends, in order to attain some respectability⁶. That Trojan woman is a slow business; but, however, there is some hope. Do you bring these matters to a conclusion. You may expect to hear from me again with more freedom. January 27, in the consulship of M. Messala and M. Piso.

LETTER XIV.

I AM afraid you will be tired of hearing how much I am engaged; but in truth I have been so busy, that I have scarcely had time for this short letter, and that has been snatched from important occupations. I mentioned in a former letter⁷ Pompeius's first harangue; that it was not acceptable to the poor, that it appeared spiritless to the wicked, unsatisfactory to the rich, undignified to the good: in short, it was a cold performance. Afterwards, at the instigation of the consul Piso, that inconsiderate tribune Fufius brought Pompeius forth to the assembly of the people. The business was conducted in the Flaminian Circus⁸, and the same day, in that very place, was a fair held. He inquired of him whether he approved of the judges being chosen by the prætor in the affair of Clodius's sacrilege; which judges the same prætor was to use as his council; as it had already been appointed by the senate. Upon which Pompeius spoke quite aristocratically; replying, that the authority of the senate on all occasions had now, and always, the greatest weight with him; and this he professed at great length. Afterwards the consul Messala inquired of Pompeius in the senate, what he thought of the offence to religion, what of the indictment announced. He spoke in such a manner in the senate as to commend generally all the acts of that body; and said to me, as he sat by me, that he thought his answer contained a sufficient reply to the questions proposed to him. Crassus, perceiving that it gained him applause to have it supposed that he was pleased with my consulate, rose up, and spoke of my consulate in the handsomest manner, saying, that he owed it to me that he was a senator, that he enjoyed his freedom and his life; that as often as he saw his wife, his home, his country, so often he saw blessings derived from me: in short, all those topics of fire and sword, which I used variously to represent in my speeches (you, who are my Aristarchus and critic, know those repositories of ornaments), he interwove with great effect. I was sitting next Pompeius, and observed him to be moved; whether it was that Crassus should have gained the applause which he had missed, or that my deeds should be so esteemed as to obtain the ready concurrence of the senate to the praises bestowed upon them, especially by one who owed it me the less, because, in all my letters in commendation of Pompeius, he had been lightly spoken of. This day much attached me to Crassus: and whatever was given covertly, I willingly acknowledged from him openly. But as for myself, ye gods! how I exulted before my new hearer, Pompeius! If periods and inflections, if deductions and arguments, ever availed me, it was then: in short, there were general cheers: for the subject was, of the dignity

³ The Attic manner of writing and speaking was always considered as the most perfect model.

⁴ The tribune Metellus had been active in opposing Cicero, charging him with having put citizens to death without a trial.

⁷ This letter is lost.

⁸ Pompeius having applied for the honour of a triumph, was obliged to conform to the custom of reading beyond the walls of Rome till that was over. It was, therefore, in compliment to him that the meetings of the people and of the senate were at this time held out of the city.

of the senate, the unanimity of the knights, the consent of all Italy, the expiring remains of the conspiracy, of plenty and peace. You know my powers on such materials: they were so exerted, that I am the more brief, because I imagine that they must have been heard even as far as you.

But this is the state of affairs at Rome. The senate is our *Areopagus*¹: nothing can be more firm, nothing more upright, nothing more strenuous; for when the day was come for bringing forward the impeachment, according to the decree of the senate, there were collected youths scarcely bearded, the whole herd of Catiline, with the effeminate son of Curio at their head, demanding of the people to set aside the impeachment. Even Piso, the consul, who had proposed it, was now exerting himself against it. The Clodian mob had got possession of the passages; and voting papers were furnished so, that none might be given signifying assent. Here then Cato rushes to the rostra², and utters a most severe reproach on the consul Piso, if that can be called reproach, which is full of dignity, full of authority, full of wholesome counsel. Our friend Hortensius follows to the same purpose, and many other good men; but the assistance of Favonius was particularly distinguished. In this concourse of principal persons the assembly is dismissed; the senate is convoked; when it was decreed, in a full house, (while Piso was contending against it, and Clodius was entreating at the feet of each individual,) that the consuls should use their authority with the people to admit the impeachment. Fifteen voted with Curio against passing the decree; on the other side were at least four hundred. The thing was concluded. Fufius, the tribune, then gave way. Clodius made some pitiful addresses, in which he treated Hortensius, C. Piso, and the consul Messala, with great disrespect; me he only charged with having found out³ everything. The senate determined that nothing should be done respecting the provinces of the prætors, the embassies, and other business, till the impeachment should have been brought forward. Here you have the history of the Roman affairs. But yet I must tell you also what I had not hoped for: the consul Messala is excellent, brave, firm, diligent, and extols, loves, and imitates me: the other is by one fault the less faulty; in that he is indolent, sleepy, inexperienced, incapable of business; but in will so ill-disposed, that he began to hate Pompeius ever after that meeting in which he praised the senate. He has therefore wonderfully alienated from him all the best people; nor is he induced to act thus more by friendship towards Clodius, than by a love of ruinous and factious measures. But he has nobody among the magistrates like him. With the exception of Fufius, we enjoy a good set of tribunes; and Cornutus is another Cato. But now, to return to private matters, the Trojan woman has made good her promises. Do you accomplish the commissions which you have undertaken. My brother Quintus, who has purchased the remaining three quarters of the Argiletan building for 725 sestertia (5000*l.*), is desirous of selling his Tusculanum, in order to buy, if he can, Pacilius's house. I want you to be reconciled to Lucceius. I see him very desirous of it, and will lend my assistance. Let me know exactly what you are doing, where you are, and how things are going on. The 13th of February.

² It is hardly necessary to observe, that the Romans used to address the people in their assemblies from a raised pulpit, called the rostra.

LETTER XV.

You have heard that the province of Asia¹ has fallen to my dear brother Quintus; for I doubt not but common report has brought you this intelligence swifter than any friend's letter. Now, as you know I have always been very greedy of praise; and am, and am esteemed, beyond all men attached to the Greeks; and have incurred much obloquy and enmity in the cause of the republic; do you therefore "call to mind all your prowess," and by your management contrive that I may be praised and loved by everybody. Upon this subject I will write more to you in the letter I shall send by Quintus himself. I should be glad if you would let me know what you have done about my commissions: and what, also, about your own business; for since your departure from Brundisium, no letters from you have been delivered to me. I want much to know how you do. March 15.

LETTER XVI.

You ask me what happened at the trial, that the issue should have been so contrary to all expectation; and at the same time you desire to know how it happened that I battled less than usual. I shall answer you the last first, like Homer². For, as long as the authority of the senate required my support, I fought with such eagerness and vehemence, as to excite shouts and acclamations greatly to my honour. And if ever you thought me strenuous in the public cause, you would certainly have admired me upon that occasion; for when he had recourse to his declamations, and in them used my name invidiously, ye immortal gods! what fighting, what execution did I exhibit! What attacks did I make upon Piso, upon Curio—upon the whole crew! How did I assail the levity of the old, the wantonness of the young! Often did I want you, so help me gods! not only as an adviser of my plans, but as a witness of my extraordinary exertions. But after Hortensius had devised that the tribune Fufius should bring in the law respecting the sacrifice (in which there was no other difference from the consular indictment, excepting in the condition of the judges; though in that was everything), and was earnest that it might be so done; having persuaded himself, and others, that no judges^a could absolve him, I contracted my sails, knowing well the inefficiency of such judges, and I said nothing in my evidence but what was so well known and attested that I could not omit it. If, therefore, you ask me the reason of the acquittal (to revert now to your first question), it was the neediness and baseness of the judges; and that it should so happen was occasioned by Hortensius's proposal; who, fearing lest Fufius's intercession might put a stop to the progress of the law, as decreed by the senate, did not perceive that it was better to have him left in disgrace and ignominy, than intrusted to an unsound court of judgment. But prompted by his hatred, he hastened to bring the matter to a trial, saying, that even before a leaden sword he must needs fall. But if you ask what were the circumstances of this judgment which had so incredible an issue, I answer, such that the counsel of Hortensius, which now from the event is censured by others, was by me censured from the very beginning. For as the rejection of a judge is made with the greatest applause, when the prosecutor, like an upright censor, rejects persons of bad character, and the defendant, like a kind master of gladiators, selects the most temperate; here, on the contrary, as soon as the judges sat down together, all honest men began to have sad misgivings^b; for a baser set never met together in a common gaming-house: senators of stained reputation, ruined knights, and tribunes, not debtors, so much as receivers^c. There were, however, a few honest men among them, whom he could not remove by rejection, who sat downcast and mournful among people most unlike to themselves, and seemed afraid of being infected by the contagion of their infamy. Here, as each charge was submitted to this council, in the first inquiries, there appeared a surprising severity, without any difference of opinion: the defendant had obtained nothing; more was even granted to the prosecutor than he asked; Hortensius, in short, was exulting that he should have managed so well. There was nobody who did not think him guilty, and a thousand times condemned. Upon my being brought forwards as a witness, I imagine you will have heard from the acclamation even of Clodius's advocates, what rising of the judges took place, how they surrounded me, how openly they exposed their throats to P. Clodius for my security: which I consider a much greater honour than that which was shown to Xenocrates, whom your countrymen prevented from swearing when he gave his testimony: or that of our judges, who refused to look at the accounts of Metellus Numidicus, when they were brought round as usual. What was done to me, I say, is much greater. So that by the voice of his judges, when I was so defended by them as the safeguard of the country, the culprit was confounded, and all his supporters shrunk at once; and the next day the same concourse came about me as had conducted me home on resigning the consulship. The noble Areopagites^d cried out that they would not come forward unless a guard was appointed. It was submitted to the council: one voice alone was against having a guard. The affair was brought before the senate: it was decreed with great dignity and liberality; the judges were commended; the business was intrusted to the magistrates: nobody thought the man would make any reply. Say now, ye Muses, how the fire was first kindled^e. You know Baldhead^f, him of the Nanneian estates, that panegyrist of mine, whose speech I mentioned to you so full of my praise. In two days he accomplished the whole business by means of a single slave, and him taken from the school of the gladiators. He sent for the judges to come to him; he promised, he entreated, he bribed. Nay, more, O ye gods! such a profligate business! even the enjoyment of certain women, and the introduction of young men of family, were made to enhance the price offered to some of the judges. Thus, in the general absence of all honest men, while the forum was filled with slaves, there were still twenty-five judges so firm, that, in face of the greatest danger they chose rather to perish than to ruin everything: these were thirty-one who were more moved by famine than by fame: one of whom Catulus meeting said to him, "What made you ask us for a guard? were you afraid of having your money taken away?" You have here, as shortly as I could give it you, the nature of the trial, and the reason of the acquittal.

² The original is taken from a verse of Homer. Cicero means to request that Atticus, who was invited to be lieutenant to Quintus, would exert himself to render the Greeks of Asia Minor favourable to him; and that he should do so, he offers three reasons: 1st, that he was fond of praise from all men; 2dly, that he had himself always shown a partiality towards the Greeks; and 3dly, because he was apprehensive lest the enemies he had made by his vigorous conduct in his consulship might endeavour to injure his reputation abroad. Atticus, however, refused to accept the appointment of lieutenant.

You ask further what is the present state of public affairs, and how I am affected. Know, then, that the constitution of the republic; which you thought my counsels, I thought divine Providence^g, had confirmed; which seemed to be fixed and consolidated by the union of all good men, and the authority of my consulship; unless some god have compassion upon us, has slipped from our hands by this single judgment: if it can be called a judgment, that thirty of the lowest and most profligate of the Roman people, by the effect of bribery, should extinguish all right and justice: and, what not only all men, but all animals, know to have been done, that Taina, and Plautus, and Spongia, and such scoundrels, should determine not to have been done. But yet, that I may offer you some consolation on the part of the republic, wickedness does not exult in its victory with that alacrity which some miscreants had hoped, after ^a The term is here used in derision.

^b The original is quoted from Homer.

^c Baldhead—in the original Calvus, which, besides meaning bald, as I have expressed it, was the name of a considerable family in ancient Rome. Here it is used in mockery for Crassus. What is the exact signification of ex Nannejanis commentators are not agreed.

^d I doubt not these expressions have a reference to the doctrines of Epicurus against a superintending Providence; Atticus, as is well known, being of that sect.

^e The judges of ancient Rome corresponded to our jury rather than to our judges, and determined the fact, not the law. Their number varied at different times.

^f The foregoing sentence has been differently, but I think wrongly, understood by commentators.

^g Intimating that they were both ruined and bribed. The sense is rendered in some measure obscure for the sake of the poor antithesis of erati and erarii.

this wound which has been inflicted on the state; for they fully thought, when religion and modesty, when the faith of judgments, and the authority of the senate had fallen, that then wickedness and licentiousness, being openly victorious, would exact of every honest man vengeance for the pain which every villain had suffered by the severity of my consulship. And I, that same person (for I need not fear the reproach of vain-gloriousness in speaking of myself to you, especially in a letter which I wish nobody else to read), myself, I say, have revived the drooping spirits of good men, encouraging and rousing every one: and by persecuting and harassing these corrupt judges, I have snatched all insolence from all the supporters and favourers of that victory. I have never suffered the consul Piso to beat peace in anything: I have taken away from the man the province of Syria, already promised him; I have recalled the senate to its former severity, and have roused it from its despondence. Clodius I have crushed when he was present in the senate, both by a continued speech full of dignity, and by alteration, of which you may taste a few specimens; for the rest can neither have their force nor elegance, from want of that spirit of contention which you Greeks call ἀγών. For when we met in the senate on the 15th of May, being called upon for my opinion, I entered at length upon the general state of the republic, and seemed to be inspired when I brought in that head of my discourse—"that the conscript fathers", on the receipt of a single wound, should not be dejected, should not faint; that it was a wound of such a kind as ought neither to be dissembled nor to be feared, lest we should be thought either cowards by being alarmed at it, or stupid by not being sensible of it: that Lentulus had been twice acquitted; twice Catiline; that he now was the third let loose upon the public by his judges. You are mistaken, Clodius; the judges have reserved you not for the city, but for a prison, and have wished not to retain you in the state, but to deprive you of banishment. Therefore, conscript fathers, raise up your spirits, maintain your dignity: that concord of all good men yet remains in the republic: they have felt pain, but their courage is unabated: no new evil has been created; but what was there before has been brought to light: in the trial of one abandoned man several have been found like him." But what am I doing? I have almost included my speech in my letter. I return to our altercation. The pretty boy gets up, and objects to me that I had been at Baiae. "It is not true: but what if it were? Is it the same," added I, "as if you were to say I had been in concealment?" "What," says he, "has a fellow of Arpinum¹ to do with hot baths?" "Say this," replied I, "to your patron¹, who longed for the baths of Arpinum." (For you know the Mariner's.) "How long," says he, "shall we bear this king?" "Do you venture to pronounce the word king," said I, "when he whose name was king did not so much as mention you in his will?" (For he had devoured the inheritance of Rex in his expectation.) "You have been buying a fine house," says he. "One would think," said I, "you were accusing me of buying the judges." "They would not trust you," says he, "even on your oath." "Nay, but," said I, "five-and-twenty did trust me: the other one-and-thirty did not trust you, for they took care to receive their money beforehand." Overwhelmed by continued shouts, he sunk down, and held his tongue. My situation is this. Among the good, I am just as you left me; among the filth and dregs of the city, much better now than you left me; for it is no prejudice to me that my evidence should seem to have had no effect. Their ill-disposition has been let blood without any pain to me; and the more so, because all those supporters of that iniquity acknowledge that a very clear case was bought off from the judges. In addition to this, that wretched and hungry rabble, who hang about the popular assemblies like a leech, eager for money, imagine that I am much esteemed by this Magnus¹. And indeed we are united together by a frequent and pleasant intercourse to such a degree, that those our revellers in conspiracy², half-bearded youths, in their conversations call him Cneus³ Cicero. Therefore, in the games and shows I carry off wonderful marks of favour, without any shepherd's pipe to intermingle its hissing⁴. The public attention is just now directed to the comitia for the election of consuls. Our Magnus, against the wish of everybody, thrusts forwards the son of Aulus⁵; and in conducting this business, he endeavours to gain his cause, neither by authority nor by favour, but by those means with which king Philippus said he was able to take any castle into which an ass laden with gold could get up. It is said that a certain consul has undertaken the affair, like Doterio⁶ the player; and that he has people in his house to distribute money, which I do not believe. But there have lately been made two hateful decrees of the senate, which are supposed to be directed against the consul, on the requisition of Cato and Domitius: one, that it might be lawful to search the houses even of magistrates on informations of bribery; the other, that anybody who had distributors of money in his house, should be considered as an enemy to the state. Larco, one of the stances and private histories of those remote times are not sufficiently preserved to enable any person to speak with confidence about it.

² A title known to belong to Pompeius.

³ This may probably refer to some designation familiar to the private conversation of the two friends.

⁶ This is supposed to be Afranius, a man of no pretensions for such an appointment.

^a The senators were usually addressed by this title.

^b Pulcher, "handsome," was one of the names of the Claudian family, from which Clodius descended.

^c Baie was celebrated for its warm baths, and frequented by the voluptuous.

^d This, no doubt, alludes to Clodius's concealment in disguise at the ceremonies of the Bona Dea.

^e Arpinum, a place about sixty miles E.S.E. from Rome, where Cicero was born.

^f It has been generally supposed that Cicero, by this expression, meant the sister of Clodius, who wanted to have connected herself with Cicero. I think it more likely that he should have meant Crassus: but the particular circum-tribunes of the people, who entered upon his office at the time of the Ælian law, has been set free from the operation both of the Ælian and Fufian law, that he might introduce another on canvassing at elections; which, lame as he is[†], he has promulgated under prosperous omens. So the comitia are put off to the 27th of July. The novelty in the law is this: that anybody who shall have promised money in his tribe, if he have not given it, shall be exempt from penalty; but if he have given it, he shall have to pay to each tribe three thousand sesterii[‡] (25*l.*) annually, as long as he lives. I observed that P. Clodius had already kept this law, inasmuch as he was accustomed to promise, and not to pay. But mark you; do you perceive how my consulate, which Curio before called a deification, will, if this man be elected, become a mere puppet-show[§]? Therefore I believe we must content ourselves with our philosophy, as you do; and disregard these affairs of consulships as unworthy of notice.

As to what you tell me, that you have determined not to go into Asia, I should rather have wished that you did go; and cannot but fear that some unpleasant consequence may arise from that circumstance[¶]. At the same time I cannot blame your determination, especially after having declined to accept a province myself. I shall be content with your epigrams, which you have placed in the Amaltheum; especially since Chilius has left me, and Archias has written nothing[¶]. But having already composed a Greek poem in honour of the Luculli, I am afraid he will now turn his attention to the story of the Cæcili. I returned thanks to Antonius in your name, and delivered the letter to Manlius. I have hitherto written to you the less frequently, because I had no proper person to whom I could intrust my letters; nor did I sufficiently know what I should intrust to them. Farewell. I have now made you amends. If Cincius[¶] refers to me any business of yours, I will readily undertake it; but he is just now more occupied in affairs of his own, in which I shall not be backward in assisting him. If you are likely to be stationary, you may expect often to hear from me; but do you also write frequently. I wish you would describe to me your Amaltheum, how it is situated, how it is fitted up; and that you would send me any poems, and stories you possess on the subject of Amalthea[¶]. I should like to make one at Arpinum. I will send you something of my writing; at present there is nothing finished.

[†] Any personal defect was considered as unsplendid.

[‡] The number of the tribes was thirty-five.

[§] The Latin fabam mimum, if it be correct, is not now intelligible. I have given what I conceive to be the general signification.

[¶] The difficulties which Cicero apprehended actually took place, owing to his brother's taking ill this refusal, on the part of Atticus, to serve under him in the capacity of lieutenant.

[¶] Cicero had wished that one of these poets should have written on the subject of his consulship.

[¶] See letter 3 of this book, note ^a.

[¶] Amalthea is properly the fabulous name of the fabulous goat which was said to have nourished the infant Jupiter: it is, therefore, rightly expressed in this place. But Atticus's library was denominated Amaltheum. See letter 13 of this book, note ^c.

LETTER XVII.

I PERCEIVE from your letter, and from the copies of my brother Quintus's which you sent with it, a great alteration in his disposition and sentiments towards you; which affects me with all that concern which my extreme love for you both might be expected to produce; and I wonder what can have happened, that should occasion to my brother Quintus either such deep offence, or such changeableness of mind. I had already observed, what I saw that you also suspected at the time of your departure, that some unfavourable impression had arisen, and that he was hurt in mind, and harboured certain unfriendly suspicions; which, though I before often wished to heal, and especially after the allotment of his province; yet I was not aware that the offence he had conceived was so great as your letter declares; nor were my endeavours attended with the success that I hoped. But yet I consoled myself with the consideration, that I did not doubt but he would see you either at Dyrrachium, or somewhere in those parts; and whenever that happened, I trusted, and persuaded myself, that everything would be amicably settled between you, not only by discourse and explanation, but by the very sight and meeting of each other. For what kindness there is in my brother Quintus, what cheerfulness, how tender a disposition both to conceive and to lay aside offence, it is needless for me to mention to you, who are well acquainted with it. But it has happened very unfortunately that you have not seen him anywhere. For what the malevolence of certain persons has suggested to him, has had more influence than either his duty or his relationship, or the former affection between you, which ought to have great weight: and it is easier to guess, than to declare, where the blame of this misfortune lies: for in defending my own relations, I am afraid of appearing harsh towards yours[¶]. For this is my feeling upon the subject, that though no wound may have been inflicted by those of his own household, yet they certainly might have healed that which was already received. But the fault of this whole affair, which extends even something further than appears, I can better explain to you when we meet. Respecting the letter which he wrote to you from Thessalonica, and the language which you imagine he held with your friends at Rome, and upon his journey; what foundation there be for it I know not; but all my hope of removing this vexation rests in your kindness. For if you consider, that the minds of the best men are often irritable, and at the same time placable; and that this sensibility, as I may call it, and tenderness of nature, is generally a sign of goodness; and, what is the chief of all, that we ought mutually to bear with the ill humours, or faults, or offences of each other; these differences, as I hope, will easily be composed: and that you may do so, I earnestly entreat you: for it is of the greatest concern to me, who sincerely love you, that there should be no one of my connexions who either does not love you, or is not loved by you. That part of your letter was by no means necessary, in which you explain what opportunities of advantage either in the provinces or in the city you have foregone, as well at other times, as during my consulate^a: for your ingenuousness and greatness of mind are well known to me. Nor have I ever thought there was any difference between us, except in the line of life we adopted; inasmuch as a certain ambition has led me to the pursuit of honours; whilst a different, but most irreproachable, scheme of life, has conducted you to an honourable retirement. In that true praise of sincerity, of diligence, of scrupulous adherence to duty, I set neither myself nor anybody else before you; and in affection towards me, when I go beyond brotherly and domestic attachments, I attribute the first place to you. For I have seen, and thoroughly known, on various occasions, both your solicitude and your joy on my account. And often has your congratulation on my success been delightful to me, and your support in my fears most grateful. Nay, at this time, from your absence, I feel a want not only of counsel, in which you excel, but of that intercourse of conversation, which I enjoy with peculiar relish in your company. What shall I say^b? In business of the state? in which it is not allowable for me to be negligent; or in the fatigues of the forum? which formerly I undertook for ambition's sake; now, that I may be able by favour to maintain my dignity, or even in domestic concerns? in which both before, and particularly since the departure of my brother, I want you and our conversations. In short, neither my labour, nor my rest, neither my business, nor my idleness, nor forensic, nor domestic affairs, nor public, nor private, can any longer proceed without your sweet and friendly counsel and conversation. From the mention of these things modesty has often restrained us both. But it has now been rendered necessary by that part of your letter in which you study to clear and justify yourself and your conduct. And amidst the embarrassments arising from his alienated and offended mind, this however has happened fortunately, that your resolution of declining all provincial employments has been known, and occasionally professed by you to me and others of your friends; so that your not being together may appear to be the effect not of any disagreement and rupture between you, but of your inclination and judgment; whence I trust those sentiments which have been violated will easily admit of expiation; and these between us, which have been kept sacred, will continue to be religiously maintained.

We are here engaged in a sickly, wretched, and changeable republic. For I suppose you have heard of our knights^b being nearly disunited from the senate. First they took it very ill that a decree of the senate should have been promulgated, to institute an inquiry into those who should have received money as judges. At the passing of this decree I was accidentally absent; but when I found that the equestrian order was much disturbed at it, though they did not openly say so, I reproved the senate, as I thought, with great authority; and spoke forcibly and copiously in not the most honourable cause. Now for another favourite concern of the knights, scarcely to be borne, which, however, I have not only borne, but justified. The farmers of the revenue in Asia^c, who had made their agreement with the censors, complained in the senate that they had been deceived by the hope of gain, and had made an improvident bargain, and petitioned that the letting might be set aside. I took the lead among their supporters; or rather I was the second; for it was Crassus who encouraged them to present this request. An odious business, disreputable petition, and a confession of impudence. But there was the greatest reason to apprehend, that, if they gained no redress, they might be altogether alienated from the senate: This affair also was principally managed by me; and it was brought about that they obtained a very full and very friendly senate; and I said a good deal respecting the dignity and unanimity of the two orders, on the first of December and day following. The business is not yet finally settled, but the inclination of the senate has been clearly seen. Metellus, the consul elect, had alone spoken against it. That hero of ours, Cato, was going to speak, but owing to the shortness of the day it did not come to his turn. Thus maintaining my proposed line of conduct, I support, as well as I am able, that concord I had endeavoured to cement. But yet, since these measures are liable to fail, a certain safe way, as I hope, is fortifying to enable me to retain my authority. I cannot sufficiently explain this to you by letter, but I will give you a little hint. I am very familiar with Pompeius. I know what you will say. I will use caution, wherever caution can be used; and I will write more fully to you some other time about my intentions in conducting the business of the republic. Do you know that Luceius purposes immediately to solicit the consulship? for there are said to be only two candidates. Caesar, with whom he thinks he may unite through Arrius; and Bibulus, with whom he supposes he may be joined through C. Piso. Do you laugh? Believe me, this is no laughing matter. What else shall I tell you? What? There are many things: but at another time. If you would have us expect you, take care to let me know. Now I modestly beg, what I earnestly wish, that you will come as soon as you can. The fifth of December.

LETTER XVIII.

THERE is nothing of which I now so much feel the want, as of him with whom I can communicate every thing that concerns me; who loves me, who is prudent,—with whom I can converse without flattery, without dissimulation, without reserve. For my brother, who is all candour and kindness, is away; Metellus is no more to me than the seashore, or the air, a mere desert: but you, who have so often relieved my cares and anxieties by your conversation and counsel, who used to be my companion in public matters, my confidant in all private ones, the partaker of all my words and thoughts, where are you? I am so deserted by ^a It is to be supposed that Cicero, during his consulship, would not fail to offer his assistance in procuring for Atticus any appointment he might wish to hold.

^b The sense I have given to this passage is not agreeable to the usual punctuation, but appears to me most consonant to Cicero's ordinary manner of writing, and most suitable to the context.

^c The Roman people were divided into three orders, senators, knights, and plebeians. The business of the knights was chiefly to act as judges, or as farmers of the public revenue.

^c Asiatic appear to have been persons from the order of knights, who rented of the censors the collection of the tributes from Asia Minor, as was usual in other provinces, for five years at a time.

everybody that I have no other comfort but what is enjoyed with my wife and daughter, and my sweet little Cicero. For those ambitious and outward friendships make some show in public, but have no domestic fruit. So that whilst my house is full every morning,—whilst I go down to the Forum attended with troops of friends,—out of this crowd I can find nobody with whom I can either jest freely or open my bosom familiarly. Therefore I look for you, I want you, nay I call for you. For there are many things which trouble and distress me, which, could I pour them into your ears, I seem as if I could discharge in the conversation of a single walk. The stings and vexations of my domestic troubles I shall keep to myself, and not trust to this letter and to a strange messenger. And these (for I would not have you think too much of them) are not of great moment; but yet they hang upon me, and tease me, and have no friendly counsel or conversation to allay them. But in the republic, although there is a ready courage, yet the inclination to exert itself does again and again elude every remedy^d. Should I but shortly collect together what has been done since your departure, you must needs exclaim, that the state of Rome can no longer subsist. For it was, I believe, after you left us, that the first entrance was made upon the cause of the Clodian story. Upon which occasion, conceiving that I had an opportunity of cutting down and restraining the licentiousness of the young, I exerted myself with vehemence, and poured forth all the powers of my mind and understanding,—influenced by no hostility towards anybody, but by the hope of correcting the republic and healing the state. Deeply is the republic injured by this corrupt and profligate judgment^e. See now what has since taken place: a consul^f has been imposed upon us whom nobody that is not as much a philosopher as ourselves can bear to look at without a sigh. How severe a wound is this! After a decree of the senate had passed respecting bribery at elections, respecting the conduct of judges, no law was carried through,—the senate was worried out,—the Roman knights alienated. So that year overturned two supports of the state which by me alone had been established; for the senate both threw away its authority and dissolved the union of the two orders. Now then another fine year has been entered upon! Its beginning has been such that the annual rites in honour of the tutelary goddess of Youth were omitted. For Memmius was engaged in initiating the wife of M. Lucullus in rites of his own^g. Menelaus^h, not brooking that, procured a divorce. But whereas that Idean shepherdⁱ had only abused Menelaus,—this Paris of ours has treated both Menelaus and Agamemnon^j with scorn. But there is one C. Herennius, a tribune, whom perhaps you have never heard of (though you may have heard of him, for he belongs to your tribe)^k; and Sextus, his father, used to distribute among you the money of the candidates^l. This man wants to translate P. Clodius to the condition of a plebeian^m; and the same fellow proposes that the populace at large should vote on this affair of Clodius in the Campus Martiusⁿ. I have given him such a reception in the senate as I am accustomed to do to such scoundrels; but nothing can be more insensible than he is. Metellus is an excellent consul, and attached to me; but it lessens his authority that he has, as a matter of form, promulgated this proposal respecting Clodius. But this son of Aulus^o, ye gods! how dull, how spiritless a soldier; how well he deserves to lead an ear every day, as he does, to hear himself abused by P. Calpurnius. An Agrarian law has been promulgated by Flavius, a poor thing, almost the same as that of Plotius. In the mean time there is not a sound statesman, not a phantom of one, to be found. He who might be one, my intimate (for so he is, and I wish you to know it) Pompeius defends that painted robe of his^p by keeping silence. Crassus utters not a word against the favour of the people. The others you are already acquainted with; who are so stupid that they hope to preserve their luxurious stewards when the republic is lost. The only person who administers any relief, rather by his firmness and integrity than by his counsel or prudence, is Cato, who now for the third month continues to harass the poor collectors^q, who have been very friendly to him. So we are compelled to pass no decree about other matters till an answer is given to these collectors. I expect therefore that even the business of the embassies will be put off. You see now by what waves we are tossed: and if from what I have said you perceive that there is as much more unsaid, yet visit us once more; and although these parts to which I call you deserve to be shunned, nevertheless let the value you set upon our friendship be such, that you may be glad to enjoy it even with these vexations. For, that you may not be registered as an absentee, I will take care to have your return given out and proclaimed everywhere. To be registered just at the lustration^r is like a very merchant Agamemnon was brother to Menelaus. Memmius, who had thus insulted M. Lucullus, had before injured his brother, in opposing his petition for a triumph.

^k The people of Rome were distributed into thirty-five tribes.

^l The inferior magistrates were elected by the tribes, and probably might distribute money amongst those of their own tribe for this purpose.

^m Clodius wanted, for factious purposes, to become tribune, for which it was necessary he should be a plebeian. He therefore contrived to get adopted into a plebeian family.

ⁿ The tribunes had the power of calling the comitia tributa in the Campus Martius; and, in voting by tribes, as every citizen had a voice in his own tribe, consequently the plebeians had a great majority.

LETTER XIX.

Nor only if I had as much leisure as you have, it also if I was content to send such short letters, should surpass you, and write much oftener than you do. But, besides my great and incredible occupations, I never suffer any letter to go to you without some argument and opinion. First then, it is proper in writing to such a lover of his country, I will send you an account of what is going forward in the republic; next, as I know your affection to me, I will tell you what I conceive you may not be unwilling to hear relating to myself. And with respect to the republic, the chief concern at present is the apprehension of a Gallic war. For the Edui, our brethren (as they have been called), are actually fighting; the Sequani have been fighting very ill; and the Helvetii are without doubt in arms, and making incursions into the Roman province. The senate has decreed that the consuls should have the two Gauls allotted to them; that a levy should be made; that exemptions should not be admitted; that ambassadors should be despatched with authority, who should go to the cities of Gaul and take care that they do not join the Helvetii. The ambassadors are Q. Metellus Creticus, and L. Flaccus, and (by an ill assortment, like the Greek proverb of pouring precious ointment upon lentils) Lentulus the son of Clodianus. And here I cannot forbear mentioning, that when, among the consulars, the first lot fell upon me, a full senate with one voice determined that I ought to be retained in the city. After me the same thing happened to Pompeius: so that we two seemed to be kept as pledges of the republic. Why then should I look for the applauses of others when these spring up at home? Now this is the state of the city affairs. The Agrarian law was vehemently urged by the tribune Flavius, though the author of it was Pompeius, and it had nothing popular besides its author. From this law I took out, with the approbation of the assembly, whatever affected the interests of private persons: I exempted the land which had been sold in the consulship of P. Mucius and L. Calpurnius; I confirmed the possessions of Sulla's people; the Volaterrani and Arretini, whose lands Sulla had declared public, but had not allotted, I retained in the enjoyment of their property. One plan I did not object to, that land should be purchased with this adventitious money, which might be derived, for the space of five years, from the tributes of the countries newly conquered. The senate was adverse to the whole of this Agrarian scheme, suspecting that it was designed only to give some new power to Pompeius; for Pompeius had used great exertions to accomplish his wish of carrying the law through. But, with the full approbation of those who were to occupy the lands, I confirmed the titles of the actual possessors (for our strength, as you know, lies in the rich proprietors), whilst I satisfied the people and Pompeius (for that also I wished to do) by the purchase; which being carefully conducted, I hoped the lees of the city might be drawn off, and the waste lands of Italy peopled. But this whole affair has cooled again, having been interrupted by the war. Metellus is indeed a good consul, and is much attached to me: the other is such a mere cipher, that he does not even know what it is that he has bought. These are the chief things of the republic; unless you may think it concerns the republic also, that one Herennius, a tribune of the people, of your tribe, a good-for-nothing and needy fellow, has several times instituted a motion for transferring P. Clodius to the rank of a plebeian: but many have interposed their prohibition. This, I think, is what has been doing in the republic. But for myself, after having once obtained the distinguished and immortal glory of that fifth of December, not without much envy and ill will, I have never ceased to exert the same spirit in the republic, and to support that dignity which I had entered upon and attained. But when I had witnessed, first, in the acquittal of Clodius, the inconstancy and weakness of the judges; then saw how easily our knights collectors, though they continued friendly to me, were disunited from the senate; then again, that certain happy spirits (those luxurious possessors of fishponds, I mean, your friends) are undisguisedly envious of me; I considered that it was time to look out for some greater support and stronger securities. Therefore, first I brought Pompeius, who had too long observed a silence upon my transactions, into that disposition, that in the senate, not once, but repeatedly, and at considerable length, he attributed to me the safety of the empire and of the world: which did not so much concern me (for what I did is not so obscure as to stand in need of testimony, or so doubtful as to require commendation) as the republic; because there were certain ill-disposed people who expected that some contention might arise between me and Pompeius from a disagreement upon those matters. With him I have united myself in such intimacy, that each of us may hence be more fortified in his own line of conduct, and firmer in the republic from this connexion. And that hostility of the licentious and delicate youth, which had been raised against me, has been so softened by my civility, that they all now pay me particular attention. In short, I do nothing harsh towards anybody,—nor, however, any thing popular and unbecoming; but my whole conduct is so regulated, that I maintain a constancy towards the republic; and in my private concerns, on account of the unsteadiness of the good, the unkindness of the malevolent, the hatred of the wicked, towards me, I adopt a certain caution and attention; and so bear my affections, whilst I am implicated in these new connexions, that the sly Sicilian Epicarmus often whispers in my ear that verse of his,—“Be sober and distrustful; these are the sinews of the understanding:” and of my management and scheme of life you see, I think, as it were a model. Respecting your business you often write to me; but it is impossible to remedy it,—for the decree of the senate was carried by a great concurrence of members, without the authority of any of us consulars. For, as to your seeing that I was present when it was drawn up, you may understand from the decree itself that a different object was at that time brought forward; and this about the free people was added without any occasion,—and was so done by P. Servilius the son, who gave his opinion among the last. But at this time it cannot be altered: so that the meetings which were at first held on this subject have long since ceased to be kept up. If, however, by your gentle manners you have squeezed out of the Sicyonians any portion of money, I should be glad to be made acquainted with it. I have sent you the account of my consulate, written in Greek; in which, if there is anything that appears to an Attic gentleman not to be correct and good Greek, I will not say to you, what I think Lucullus said of his history, that he purposely introduced some barbarisms, that it might be known to be the work of a Roman. In mine if there be anything of that sort, it will be without my knowledge, and contrary to my inclination. If I complete that in Latin, I will send it to you. You may expect the third in verse*, that I may omit no mode of celebrating my own praises. Here take care that you do not quote upon me the Greek proverb, "Who will praise his father?" For if there is anything better among men let it be praised, and let me be blamed for not rather bestowing my praises elsewhere; though what I write is, after all, not praise, but history. My brother Quintus studies to exculpate himself in his letters, and affirms that he never spoke anything against you to anybody: but this must be managed between us with great care and diligence when we meet. Do you only at length visit us again. This Cossinius, to whom I give my letter, seems to me an excellent man, free from levity, and affectionate towards you, and such as your letter represented him. The 15th of March.

LETTER XX.

UPON my return to Rome from my Pompeianum† on the 12th of May, our friend Cincius gave me your letter dated the 13th of February, to which I now reply. And first, I am very glad that you are so perfectly acquainted with my opinion respecting you‡. In the next place, it gives me great satisfaction that you should have shown such moderation in those affairs in which I and my family were concerned, not without some appearance of harshness and unkindness; which is a proof at once of no small affection, and of consummate judgment and prudence. On which

* This he afterwards executed. See book ii. letter 3.

† Some doubts have been entertained about the application of this proverb. In the beginning of Plutarch's life of Aratus it is quoted more at length; and from thence I should understand it here to signify, that as it was concluded that one who praised the deeds of his ancestors, had no merit of his own; so it might be inferred, that if Cicero was so vain of his consulship he had little else to boast of.

‡ Cicero possessed several villas, one of which was near Pompeii.

§ This probably alludes to what he had said in letter 17 of this book.

subject as you have written so graciously, so carefully, so fairly, and candidly, that I not only have nothing further to ask of you, but had no right to expect so much readiness and mildness from you, or from any man; I think it best to say nothing more about the business. When we meet, then, if any occasion occurs, we will confer together by word of mouth.

In what you say about the republic, you argue affectionately and wisely; and your opinion is not at variance with the line of conduct I have adopted. I ought neither to recede from the state of my dignity, nor to go without my host into the fortifications of another man; and he^b of whom you speak, has nothing noble, nothing exalted, nothing that is not abject and popular. Yet the course I have taken is perhaps not without its advantage to myself in promoting the tranquillity of my own times; but it is still much more advantageous to the republic than to me, that the violence of the wicked against me should be repressed by my having confirmed the wavering opinion of one in the highest fortune, authority, and favour; and by having converted him from the hopes of bad men to the commendation of my actions. Had any meanness been necessary on my part, I should have thought no object an equivalent; but everything has been done in such a manner, that my dignity has sustained no diminution from compliance with him, while his is increased by his approbation of me. The rest is, and will continue to be, so managed, as not to permit that what I have done, may appear to have been done by accident. My good men, those whom you mention, and that Sparta^c, which you say has fallen to my lot, I will not only never desert, but even if I am deserted by it, I will still continue in my former sentiments. I would wish you, however, to consider, that, since the death of Catulus, I maintain this course of honour without protectors, and without associates: for as Rhinton, I think, says, "some are as nothing, others care for nothing." With regard to the envy which our epicures bear me, I will either write to you at another time or will reserve it till we meet. But nothing shall tear me from the senate; whether because it is right that we should be united, or that it is most suitable to my affairs, or that I am not sorry to be held in such esteem by them.

With regard to the Sicyonians, as I told you in a former letter, there is not much hope in the senate. For there is now nobody that offers any complaint. So that, if you wait for this, it is a long business. Try some other means if you can. For it has been concluded without animadversion from those whom it concerned; and the senators hastily ran to support the motion. The season is not yet come for superseding the decree; because there are not only none to complain, but many are very well pleased; partly through malice, partly from an opinion of its justice. Your friend Metellus is an excellent consul. I have only to blame in him, that he is not very well pleased with the news of peace from Gaul. I suppose he is ambitious of a triumph. In this I wish he were more moderate. Everything else is excellent. But this son of Aulus behaves in such a manner, that his consulate is no consulate, but the mortification of our Magnus*. Of my writings I have sent you my consulate in Greek. I delivered the book to L. Cossinius. But while you are pleased with my Latin compositions, I imagine that, as a Greek, you will bear towards this Greek one a little envy. If anybody else writes upon this subject I will send it you. But, believe me, as soon as they have read this of mine, they are somehow checked. Now, to return to my own business, L. Papirius Pætus, a good man, and fond of me, has made me a present of the books which Ser. Claudius left. As your friend Cincius declared that, by the Cincian law^f, it was allowable to take them, I said that I should most willingly accept them if he offered them^g. Now, if you love me, if you know that you are beloved by me^h, use your endeavours, through your friends, your clients, your guests, nay, your freed-men, and slaves, that not a scrap of them may be lost. For I want exceedingly both the Greek books, which I suspect, and the Latin, which I know he left. I have every day more satisfaction in these studies, whenever the business of the forum permits. You will render me a most, I say, a most grateful service, if you will attend to this with the same diligence you use in things which you suppose me to have much at heart. At the same time I recommend to you the affairs of Pætus himself, for undertaking which he gives you the greatest thanks. I not only ask, but entreat you, at length to visit us.

^c This obviously alludes to a passage in some letter from Atticus, who had applied to Cicero a Greek proverbial expression, signifying, that one who was born at Sparta ought to act worthily of this distinction.

* Magnus, or great, is well known to have been an appellation of Pompeius, who had got Afranius, the son of Aulus, to be elected consul.

made, but to Cincius, on the supposition that it might be made. It is for this reason that he adds et attulisset. He told Cincius, that since he so interpreted his namesake's law, that he might legally accept the books, he should be very glad to do so if they were offered to him.

^h This may allude particularly to some expressions which it is probable Atticus had used in his acknowledgment of letter 17, where Cicero declares his strong affection for him.

BOOK II.

LETTER I.

On the 1st of June, as I was going to Antium, and gladly leaving the gladiators of M. Metellus, I met your servant. He delivered to me your letter, and the Greek narrative of my consulship, upon which I was glad that I had previously given to L. Cossinius my book on the same subject, written likewise in Greek, which he was to take to you. For had I read yours first, you might say that I had stolen from you. Although yours, which I eagerly read, appeared to me rather rough and undressed, yet that very negligence had the effect of ornament; and, as they say of women, it was the sweeter from having no perfume.

My book, on the other hand, had exhausted the whole repository of Isocrates, and all the scent-boxes of his disciples, and, in some measure, even the colours of Aristotle. This, as you mentioned in a former letter, you just tasted at Corcyra; but afterwards I imagine you received it from Cossinius. I should not have ventured to send it you, unless I had deliberately and critically examined it. Though Posidoniusⁱ, to whom I had sent my memoir, that he might describe the same events in a more finished style, told me in his answer from Rhodes, that the perusal had not only not disposed him to write, but had completely discouraged him. What say you? I have confounded the Greek nation; so that they who pressed me to give them materials, which they might embellish, have now ceased to trouble me. If the book pleases you, you will take care to have it circulated in Athens, and other cities^j of Greece. For it may possibly throw some splendour on my affairs. I will send the speeches you ask for, and some others, since you seem to be pleased with what I have written at the desire of certain young men. For, as your fellow-citizen Demosthenes, in those orations which are called Philippics, had abode forth, and emancipated himself from that abrupt and judicial manner of speaking, that he might appear more dignified and statesman-like; so it became me to see that there should be some orations of mine, which might be called consular; of which one was delivered in the senate on the 1st of January; the next to the people on the Agrarian law; the third on the subject of Otho^k; the fourth in defence of Rabirius; the fifth on the children of the persons proscribed^l; the sixth, when in the assembly I resigned my province^m; the seventh, by which I drove out Catiline; the eighth, which I delivered to the people the day after Catiline's flight; the ninth, in the assembly on the day when the Allobroges gave their public testimonyⁿ; the tenth, in and dispersing of books must have been a work of great labour, and must have taken up a great deal of time.

^k Otho had been the author of a law which appropriated a distinguished part of the theatre to the use of the knights. This Otho coming into the theatre during Cicero's consulship was hooted by the populace, and supported by the knights, so as to endanger a considerable uproar; upon which Cicero summoned the people to the temple of Bellona, where he addressed them with such effect, that, upon returning to the theatre, they joined their applause to that of the knights. The oration is not extant.

^m Cicero having declined the province of Macedonia in favour of C. Antonius, was nominated to that of Cisalpine Gaul, but immediately gave it up to Q. Metellus.

ⁿ This relates to the Catilinarian conspiracy.

ⁱ Posidonius was a Stoic philosopher, under whom Cicero had studied at Rhodes.

^j Previous to the invention of printing, the transcribing the senate on the fifth of December*. There are besides, two short ones, as it were fragments, on the subject of the Agrarian law. I will take care that you shall have this whole collection. And since not only my writings, but my transactions, afford you pleasure, in the same books you will see both what I have done, and what I have said. Otherwise, you should not have asked for them; for I did not present myself to you uninvited.

As to what you inquire about the cause of my sending for you; and signify, that though you are fettered with business, yet not only if it is necessary, but if I wish it, you will come to me; there is, in truth, no immediate necessity; but I thought you might arrange the season of travelling more conveniently. You are away too long, especially as you are at no great distance, and yet we do not enjoy the fruits of your company, and you are without us. At present all is quiet; yet if the madness of the pretty[†] youth were allowed to proceed a little further, I should earnestly call you thence. But Metellus nobly prevents it, and will prevent it. What say you? He is a patriotic consul, as I always believed, and well disposed. But that fellow no longer dissembles, but openly professes his wish to be made a tribune of the people. Upon the question being agitated in the senate, I beat him down, and reproached him with his inconstancy, who at Rome was soliciting the tribunate, though at Hera, in Sicily, he had declared that he wanted to be made ædile. But I said it was not a thing about which we need give ourselves much trouble; for it would no more be permitted to him as a plebeian to ruin the state, than it had been to some, like himself, who were patricians, when I was consul. Again, when he boasted in the assembly that he had come from the strait[‡] in six days, and that nobody had time to come out to meet him, and that he had arrived in the night; I observed, that it was nothing strange that he should have come from Sicily to Rome in six days, who had gone from Rome to Interamna in three hours; that it was not the first time he had entered by night; and that nobody had met and stopped him on a former occasion, when it ought more especially to have been done. What say you? I make an impudent man modest not only by a constant dignity of speech, but even by this kind of repartee. Now, therefore, I dispute and jest familiarly with him. For, as we were conducting one of the candidates, he asks me if I used to give a place to the Sicilians in the exhibitions of gladiators[§]? I said, no. "But I," says he, "their new patron, shall adopt this; though my sister, who has such consular space^{||} allotted her, gives me but one foot." "Do not complain," said I, "of this one foot of your sister, for you are at liberty to lift up the other whenever you please[¶]." You will say this is not a very consular speech. I confess it; but I hate her, ill deserving to be called consular; for she is a seditious woman, is at war with her husband, and not only with Metellus^{}, but with Fabius also, because she is displeased with the part they take on this^{} occasion. In reply to your inquiry about the Agrarian law, it seems for the present to have cooled. As to the reproof you give me with a gentle hand respecting my familiarity with Pompeius, I would not have you imagine that I have united myself with him for the sake of my own security: but things were so circumstanced, that if by accident there should arise any disagreement between us, the greatest dissensions must have ensued in the republic: which I have guarded and provided against in such a manner, that I shall not depart from my just course; but he will become better, and lay aside something of his popular levity. For, you must know, he speaks much more magnificently of my actions, against which many had endeavoured to excite him, than of his own. For to himself he bears testimony of having well administered the state; to me of having saved it. How far his doing this may be of use to me I know not; it is certainly of use to the republic. What if I make even Cæsar a better man, who is now in the enjoyment of such prosperous gales? Should I do any great injury to the state? But, if nobody envied me, if all favoured me as they ought, yet the remedy which could cure the unsound parts of the state, would not be less desirable than that which would cut them out. But now, when that body of knights, which I stationed on the Capitoline hill under your standard, has deserted the senate; and our chiefs think they have reached the skies, if they have but bearded mullets in their fish-ponds, which will come to their hands; and neglect everything else; do you not think that I render essential service, if I prevent them from doing mischief, who have it so much in their power? For you cannot esteem our friend Cato more than I do: but he, with the best intentions and the greatest integrity, sometimes does harm to the state, by delivering his opinion as if he were living in the republic of Plato, not in the dregs of Romulus. What can be more just than that one, who had received money for his sentence, should be brought into judgment? Cato gave his opinion to this effect, and the senate assented. The knights declared war against the senate, not against me, for I dissented. What could be more impudent than the appeal of the^{††} collectors? Yet for the sake of retaining the good-will of the order, the loss should have been submitted to. Cato resisted, and carried his point: The consequence has been, that when the consul was shut up in prison^{‡‡}; when seditions have at

* This likewise relates to the Catilinarian conspiracy.

† The person here meant is evidently Clodius. He is so designated, book i. letter 16.

‡ By the Strait is to be understood the narrow sea between Italy and Sicily.

§ At the time of his trial it was falsely asserted, that Clodius had been at Interamna on the night when he was discovered in Cæsar's house at the mysteries of the Bona Dea.

|| Cicero had been quaestor in Sicily some years before; and lately Clodius had held the same office there.

¶ Clodia was wife of the consul Metellus.

* Clodius was supposed to have had incestuous commerce with his sister.

 She was married to Metellus, but supposed to entertain Fabius also with the familiarities of a husband.

 The exact meaning of the original is not obvious; but I conceive it to relate to the opposition which Metellus and Fabius gave to Clodius's design of making himself a tribune of the people.

†† These were of the order of knights, who had made an improvident bargain for taking the rents of some of the subject provinces, and petitioned to have it cancelled. See book i. letter 17.

different times been raised; not one of those men has come forwards, by whose concurrence I, and also the consuls who came after me, used to defend the republic. What then! you will say, shall we have them hired with a price? What shall we do, if we can have them upon no other terms? Should we prefer submitting ourselves to freed-men, and even slaves? But, as you say, enough of my zeal. Favonius has found my tribe more favourably disposed than his own; that of Luccius he has lost. He accused Nasica ungenerously, and yet he spake but moderately, as if he had bestowed his pains, at Rhodes, upon the mills, rather than upon Molon^a. He gently found fault with me, because I had defended Nasica. Now, however, he is again a candidate on behalf of the republic^b. I will let you know what Luccius does when I shall have seen Cæsar, who will be here in two days' time. That the Sicyonians should injure you, you may attribute to Cato, and to his emulator, Servilius. What! does not that stroke affect many good men? But, if it must be so, let us commend it; only let us afterwards, in the dissections of the state, be content to be left alone. My Amalthea^c expects and wants you. My Tusculanum and Pompeianum delight me exceedingly, excepting that they have overwhelmed me, the asserter of debts^d, not with Corinthian brass, but debts of this ordinary brass money. In Gaul I hope all is quiet. You may expect soon to receive my Prognostica^e, with the little volume of orations. In the mean time let me know what are your intentions about coming to us, for Pomponia desired I might be informed that you would be at Rome in July. This does not agree with the letters you had written to me about the time of your setting out.

Pætus, as I before mentioned to you, has presented me with all the books which his brother left. This gift of his is dependent upon your diligence. If you have any regard for me, take care that they may be preserved, and sent to me. Nothing can be more acceptable to me than this; and I would have you carefully secure the Latin as well as the Greek books. I shall regard this as your gift. I have sent a letter to Octavius^f. I had not spoken to him; for I neither supposed your business to be of a provincial nature, nor did I consider you among the scribes^g: but I have written, as it became me, with all diligence.

of the tribunes, for opposing the Agrarian law; but after a few hours was liberated by Pompeius, attended by some of the other tribunes.

^a The similarity of the Latin words suggested this expression to Cicero, which it would be perhaps impossible, and certainly trifling, to preserve in a translation.

^b He is mentioned book i. letter 14.

^c The reason of this term being applied to a library is explained before, book i. letter 13. In letter 16, book i. he mentions his intention of having an Amaltheum of his own at Arpinum.

^d This has been supposed to allude to the Catilinarian conspirators, who were many of them overwhelmed with debts. It seems to me more probable, that it should refer to his general practice as an advocate.

TAKK care, I beseech you, of our young Cicero^a: we are his uncles, and ought, according to the Greek expression, to be his guardian deities^b. I have been engaged in reading the Pellenæum^c, and have a large pile of Dicaearchus's works before me. What a great man he is! One may learn from him much more than from Proclius. At Rome I believe I have his Athenais and Corinthais. If you take my advice you will read him. This I answer for, that he is a wonderful man. Herodes, if he were wise, would read him, rather than write one syllable of his own. He has shot at me by letter; with you I see he has come to close quarters. I would sooner have been a conspirator myself, than have opposed the conspiracy, if I had thought it would be necessary to hear him^d. You are mistaken about Lollius^e; about Vinus I quite agree with you. But how is this? Do you observe that the Kalends are coming, and Antonius^f is not come? That the judges are summoned? For so they inform me, that Nigidius threatens in the assembly to call to account any judge who absents himself. I should be glad however if you have heard anything about Antonius's arrival, that you would send me word. And since you do not come hither^g, at least sup with me the day before the Kalends. Mind that you do not fail. Fare you well.

^a The son of Quintus and Pomponia.

^b The occasion and circumstances of this letter, the place from whence it is written, or to which it is directed, the persons and the books named in it, are so little known, that it is involved in considerable obscurity. Cicero seems to be speaking of his nephew, who was also nephew to Atticus, and might possibly be unwell at Rome, while Cicero was at one of his villas. I have ventured to give to this passage a sense very different from that of any commentary I have seen; and I have done so upon the authority of Plutarch, in the conclusion of his piece entitled περί φιλαδελφίας, where he observes that the very word θεῖος, signifying at once "uncle" and "divine," leads to brotherly kindness and affection: δοκεῖ γὰρ μοι τὸ ὄνομα καλῶς ὁδηγεῖσθαι πρὸς εὖνοιαν ἀδελφῶν καὶ ἀγαπῆναι. Cicero therefore employs the Greek term, because the Latin did not bear this signification.

^c Πελληναῖον. This was probably some work of Dicaearchus on the government of Pellene, a small territory of Achaia.

^d It is probable this Herodes might have written some poor account of Cicero's consulship, which it pained him to read.

^e Who Lollius or Vinus may have been is not known.

^f C. Antonius was impeached for extortion in his government of Macedonia.

^g We may suppose that this letter was addressed to Atticus at Rome, whither he was going without accepting Cicero's invitation to the villa whence he writes. Therefore, having missed him before, Cicero now appoints him to sup with him at Rome the day when he intended to go thither himself.

^a Εὐαγγέλια. This usually signifies the gratuity given suspect too, that Epicrates^o, as you say, may have grown wanton; for I did not like his military shoes, any more than his white bandages. We shall know what the case is when you come.

When you find fault with the narrowness of my windows, you must know that you find fault with the Institution of Cyrus^p: for when I made the same observation, Cyrus said that the view of lawns through wide apertures was less pleasing. For, let the sight be A, the object B C, the rays D and E—you understand the rest. If we saw by the incidence of images^q, the images might be much embarrassed in these narrow openings; but now the emanation of rays is made merrily. If you find fault with other parts, you will not find me silent, unless it be on some point which can be altered without expense.

I come now to the month of January, and to my particular situation and policy; in which we must, like Socrates, consider both sides; and then at last, like his disciples, choose what pleases us. It is truly a matter of great concern: for either a strong resistance must be made to the Agrarian law, in which there will be some fighting, but full of honour; or we must be quiet, which is the same thing as going out of the way to Solonium, or Antium; or else I must give it my support, which they say Cæsar so much expects from me, that he makes no doubt of it. For Cornelius has been with me, Balbus I mean, Cæsar's friend. He affirmed that Cæsar would follow mine and Pompeius's advice in all things, and that he would endeavour to unite Crassus with Pompeius. Here is the state of this business. I am intimately connected with Pompeius; if you please with Cæsar too. There is an opportunity of returning into favour with my enemies, of conciliating the populace, of securing tranquillity for my old age. But that former resolution of mine influences me, which is in the third book^r—"In the mean time, that course which you pursued with virtue and spirit in early youth, and also as consul, you must still maintain, and grow in reputation and the praises of good men." Calliope herself^s having dictated this to me in that book, which contains so many wholesome maxims, I think I ought not to doubt but that, in the words of Homer, "My best auspices should be to fight for my country." But let us reserve these considerations for our walks during the Compitalia^t. Do not forget the day to the messengers of good news. The letter is generally supposed to have been written from the country to Atticus at Rome, in answer to one received from him communicating this intelligence. It seems to me more natural to suppose that Cicero might have heard it elsewhere, and that it wanted confirmation.

^o This term is used to designate Pompeius, who appears to have affected some ambitious singularity of dress, and may have been suspected of interfering in the cause of Valerius.

^p This is a playful application of the title of Xenophon's work to the architect whom Cicero employed, and who happened to be named Cyrus.

^q This seems to relate to the Epicurean doctrine of images described by Lucretius, and here humorously applied to the circumstances of Cicero's house.

^r Of a poem written by Cicero on the subject of his consulate.

^s Calliope was invoked in this book to inspire him.

^t The Compitalia was a Roman festival, on which, it seems, Atticus had promised to pay Cicero a visit in the country.

before the Compitalia. I shall order the bath to be heated; and Terentia invites Pomponia: we will add your mother to our party. Bring me, from my brother Quintus's library, Theophrastus on the Love of Honour.

LETTER IV.

I AM very much obliged to you for sending me Serapion's work; of which, between ourselves, I scarcely understand a thousandth part. I have desired you may be paid for it in ready money; that you might not set it down among the expenses of your presents. But, having made mention of money, let me beg you to come to some arrangement with Titinius in any manner you are able. If he does not adhere to what he had professed, I should like best, if Pomponia agrees to it, that the things which are so dearly bought may be returned. If that cannot be done, let the money be paid, rather than have any altercation about it. I should be very glad to have you settle this before you go with your usual kindness and diligence.

Does Clodius then, as you say, go to Tigranes? Would it were on the same terms as Scepheus^a! but I have no reason to object to it. For it will be a more favourable time for my absence on a free lieutenancy^b, when my brother Quintus, as I hope, may be settled at his ease, and it may be known what that priest of the Bona Dea^c is about. In the mean time I shall entertain myself with the Muses with an even spirit, nay, with cheerfulness and satisfaction. Nor will it ever enter my mind to envy Crassus, or to repeat that I have been true to myself. I will endeavour to gratify you on the subject of geography; but I make no certain promise. It is a great undertaking; but yet, at your desire, I will try to let you have some fruit of my absence. Whatever you may have learned relating to the republic, especially whom you may think likely to be the consuls, let me know, though I am become less curious since I have determined not to trouble myself about public affairs.

I have been to see Terentia's wood. We want nothing but the Dodonean oak^d, to make us think we have possession of Epirus itself. About the Kalends I shall be either in my Formianum or Pompeianum. If I should not be in the Formianum, come, if you love me, to the Pompeianum,—it will give me great delight, and will be very little out of your way. I have ordered Philotimus to let the wall be done as you wished. I think, however,

^a Many conjectures have been formed respecting the true reading and the right interpretation of this passage. Gronovius proposes to read "Scepali conditions," and observes that Metrodorus Scepheus was sent by Mithridates to Tigranes, and there lost his life. I have adopted his emendation, but have ventured to put upon it a new construction. After all, it is very doubtful.

^b What the nature of these free lieutenancies was, is explained, book I. letter 10, note f.

^c Cicero thought to absent himself from Rome during the time of Clodius's tribunate. He was expecting that his brother Quintus might be relieved from his government before another year, and might then keep a watch upon Clodius's operations.

^d These oaks were of sacred memory, and situated in Epirus, the country of Atticus's villa, to which he here alludes.

you should consult Vettius. In these times, when the life of every good man is so precarious, I consider the enjoyment of the Palatine ground⁷ for one summer to be of great value; yet so, that I should wish nothing less, than that Pomponia, or the boy, should be exposed to any danger from its falling.

LETTER V.

I WISH indeed, and have long wished, to visit Alexandria, and the rest of Egypt; and likewise to get away from hence, where people are grown tired of me; and to return when they may again want me. But as to going at this time, and being sent by these persons^a, (I may say with Hector), "I have too much respect for the Trojans, and long-robbed Trojan ladies." For what will our nobles say if there are any remaining? that I have renounced my principles for a bribe? "The first to impute disgrace to me will be Polydamus," that Cato of ours, who alone is as good as a hundred thousand. But what will history say of us some six hundred years hence? which I value much more than the idle rumours of those who are now living. But I think we must suspend our judgment and wait. For if it should be offered, I shall still be at liberty to do as I please; and then it will be time to determine. There is some credit even in declining. Therefore, if Theophanes^a should happen to say anything to you about it, do not immediately repel him.

I am expecting to hear from you on the following subjects: what Arrius says^b; how he bears his disappointment; whether any consuls are yet provided; whether, as the people say, they are to be Pompeius and Crassus; or, as I am informed, Servius Sulpicius with Gabinus; also, whether there are any new laws; and in short, if there is any news; and since Nepos is going away, who is to have the augurate^c; with which alone I could be caught by them. See my levity. But why do I speak of these things? which I desire to have done with, and to give my whole mind and all my care to philosophy. This, I say, is my intention: would it had always been so! But now, when I have experienced the vanity of all that I once thought great, I think of dedicating myself to all the Muses. Let me, however, hear more certainly about Curtius^d, and whether anybody is fixed upon to succeed him; and what is doing about P. Clodius;

^a Caesar and Pompeius thought at this time of sending an ambassador to Alexandria, to confirm Ptolemy Auletes on his throne.

^a Theophanes was a creature of Pompeius.

^b Arrius had received a promise of support from Crassus, but was now set aside to make room for the friends of Caesar and Pompeius.

^c Upon the death of Metellus Celer it was natural to suppose that his brother Nepos might have succeeded to his office of augur; but his going now to the government of a province made him ineligible, as it was necessary to solicit it personally at Rome.

^d It is not known who this Curtius is, or what place he held.

and tell me everything, as you promise, at your leisure. I wish you to inform me also what day you think of leaving Rome, that I may acquaint you where I shall be; and I beg you will very soon let me hear about what I have written to you. I anxiously expect your letters.

LETTER VI.

WHAT I promised in a former letter, that some work should appear, the fruit of my retirement, I do not now very strongly confirm; for I am so attached myself to idleness, that I am not to be torn from it. Therefore I either amuse myself with books, of which I have an agreeable collection at Antium; or I count the waves, for the season is not favourable for catching lacertæ^a. My mind quite revolts at writing. The geographical researches which I projected are a great undertaking: for Eratosthenes, whom I had intended to follow, is strenuously opposed by Serapion, and by Hipparchus. What think you, if Tyrannio^b should join them? Besides, the subject is difficult to explain, and of a uniform nature, and less susceptible of any ornaments of writing than I had supposed; and, which is the chief of all, any cause is, to say the truth, sufficient to make me give it up. I am doubtful whether I shall settle here, or at Antium, to pass all this time^c; where I would rather have been a duumvir, than have been consul at Rome^d. You have done wiser in providing a home at Buthrotum. But believe me this town of Antium comes very near to yours. Could it be supposed there was any place so near Rome where there are many people who never saw Vatinius^e? where there is nobody besides myself who cares if any one of the twenty commissioners^f is alive and safe? where nobody interrupts me, and everybody loves me? Here then is the place to exercise my political talents: there I am not only prevented, but am weary of it. Therefore some private observations, which I may read to you alone, shall be drawn up in Theopompus's manner, or still more severely. I now trouble myself no further about the public, than to hate the wicked; and even that without anger, or rather with some pleasure in writing.

But to come to business: I have written to the city questors about my brother Quintus's affair. See what they say^g; whether there is any hope of ^a It is probable these lacertæ were some common sort of fish; but I have thought it best to retain the original word in a thing of so much uncertainty.

^b Tyrannio, a severe preceptor, with whom both the Ciceros placed their sons.

^c Cicero had determined to withdraw from Rome during the storms which he saw approaching, and which he had no power to control.

^d His conduct during his consulship, meritorious as it had been, was now going to be arraigned, which filled his mind with these sentiments. The chief magistrates of the provincial towns were called duumviri.

^e Vatinius was a factious tribune, who exerted himself this year in opposing the authority of the senate.

^f These were commissioners appointed to divide the lands of Campania agreeably to the Agrarian law.

^g I have thought it right to preserve in the translation this little irregularity of the original expression, the English language admitting it with as much propriety as the Latin.

Roman money¹; or whether we must be put off with the Pompeian ciatophorus. Moreover, settle what is to be done about the wall. Is there anything else? yes: let me be informed when you mean to go from thence.

LETTER VII.

I WILL think again about the geography. You ask me for two orations: one of which I did not care to write out, because I had left it imperfect; the other, that I might not praise a person I did not like: but I will see about this also. However, there shall be something, that you may not think I have been totally idle. What you tell me about Clodius is highly agreeable to me; and I hope, when you come, you will bring me a full account; and that you will let me hear from you in the mean time, if you know, or suspect, anything; especially what he is likely to do about the embassy. Before I read your letter I was wishing to get at the fellow², not forsooth that I might put off my engagement with him (for I am eager for the contest); but I thought he would lose whatever popularity he had acquired by being made a plebeian. "For what purpose have you passed over to the people? that you might go to salute Tigranes? Tell me; do the Armenian kings refuse to salute patricians?" In short I was prepared to work him upon this embassy; which if he slighte, and if, as you say, that excites the indignation both of the framers and supporters of the law by which he was disabled, it will be a fine scene. But, to say the truth, our Publius (Clodius) is treated rather disrespectfully: in the first place, that he who was once the only man in Caesar's house, now should not have been able to be one among twenty; then, that one embassy should have been talked of, another should have been given; that rich one for the purpose of exacting money, is reserved, I suppose, for the Pisaurian Drusus, or the glutton Vatinius: this meagre and dainty banishment is given to him, whose tribunate is reserved to suit the occasions of these gentlemen. Inflammé him, I conjure you, as much as possible. The only hope of safety is in the disagreement of these people among themselves, of which I learned some symptoms from Curio. Already Arrius complains that the consulate has been snatched away from him: Megabocchus³, and these sanguinary youths, are determined enemies. To this let there be added, yes, let there be added, that contest for the augurship. I hope often to send you fine letters upon these subjects. But I want to know what it is that you throw out obscurely; that already some of the quinqueviri⁴ themselves are beginning to speak out. What is this? for if there is anything in it, it must be better than I had imagined. I would have you understand this, not as if I made these inquiries with any view of engaging myself in public affairs. I have long since been weary of steering the state, even when it was permitted me to do so: but now, when I am obliged to quit the ship, not throwing away, but taking in the rudder⁵, I wish from the land to look at the shipwreck of those people; I wish, as says your friend Sophocles, "from under my roof to hear the frequent dripping with a tranquil mind."

You will see what is necessary about the wall. I will correct the error of Castricius: yet Quintus had written to me 25,000⁶ sesterii; now to your sister he says 30,000. Terentia salutes you. Cicero desires that you will answer for him to Aristodemus, in the same manner as you have done for his relation⁷, your sister's son. I shall not neglect your information about Amalthea⁸. Farewell.

LETTER VIII.

WHILE I was eagerly expecting a letter from you in the evening, as I usually do, I was informed that the servants had arrived from Rome. I call them in, and ask if they have any letters. They say no. What do you say, said I, is there nothing from Pomponius? Alarmed at my voice and countenance, they confessed that they had received a letter, but had lost it on their way. What think you? I was very much provoked; for all your letters lately had brought some useful or agreeable information. Now, if there was anything deserving to be recorded in the letter you sent the 16th of April, write as soon as possible, that I may not remain in ignorance; or if there was nothing but good-humour, yet repeat even that. Know that young Curio has been here to visit me. What he said about Publius (Clodius) exactly agreed with your letters. He is wonderfully incensed against our haughty kings⁹. He said that the young men were equally angry, and could not bear this state of things. We are in a good way. If we can depend upon these people, let us, methinks, mind our own affairs¹⁰. I am engaged in history. At the same time, though you may think me another Saufeius¹¹, nothing is more indolent than I am. But let me explain to you my motions, that you may determine where you will come to me. I design to go to Formianum the middle of April¹². Then (since you think I ought to omit that delicate

⁴ Who these five commissioners might be, or for what purpose they were appointed, does not appear.

⁷ In the original it is "brother." [See book i. letter 1.] They were really first-cousins.

⁸ See book i. letter 16.

⁹ Caesar, Crassus, and Pompeius.

¹⁰ Cease to trouble ourselves.

¹¹ A philosopher of great study.

basin* at this time) on the first of May I shall leave Formianum, that I may be at Antium on the third. For the games of Antium are to take place from the fourth to the sixth of May, and Tullia wishes to see them. Thence I think of going to Tusculanum, then to Arpinum, and to be at Rome on the first of June. Let me see you either in Formianum, or at Antium, or in Tusculanum. Replace your former letter, and add something new.

LETTER IX.

I HOPE you are well. Cæcilius, the quaestor, having told me that he is going to send a servant, I have written this hastily, that I might elicit your marvellous dialogues with Publius, as well those which you mention, as that which you reserve, saying it is tedious to detail your reply; also that which has not yet taken place, which that Böopis⁷ will relate to you upon her return from Solonium. I would have you believe nothing can be more agreeable to me. If the agreement relating to me is not kept I am in heaven⁸. This our Jerusalemite⁹, who brings matters before the people, shall know what a fine return he has made for my choicest speeches, of which you may expect a distinguished counterpart¹⁰. For, as well as I can guess, if that profligate¹¹ is in favour with these mighty men¹², he will not be able to exult, not only over the consular Cynic¹³, but not over those Tritons of the stews. I can never be an object of envy when I am robbed of my power, and of all my senatorian authority. But if he disagrees with them it will be absurd to attack me. However, let him if he will. Believe me, this revolution in the state has been made gaily, and with less noise than I had supposed; more speedily indeed than seemed possible; and that, partly through the fault of Cato; but, besides, through the shameful conduct of those who neglected the auspices, the Ælian, the Junian, and Licinian law, the Cæcilian, and the Didian; who threw away all the resources of the constitution; who gave away kingdoms and estates to tetrarchs; and to a few persons immense sums of money. I see now to what party envy will pass over, and where it will abide. Think that I have learned nothing either from experience, or from Theophrastus, if you do not shortly see people call out for those our times. For if the authority of the senate excited envy, what do you think will be the case, when it is transferred, not to the people, but to three ambitious men? Therefore let them make whom they will consuls, and tribunes of the people; nay, let them clothe the evil of Vatinius¹ with the painted robe of the priesthood, you will shortly see not only those who have committed no offence, but even Cato himself, who is so guilty in their eyes, raised to great honour. As for myself, if your companion Publius permits it, I mean to act the philosopher; if he designs anything, then only to defend myself; and, as becomes that profession, "I announce that I will repel any one who first insults me." Only let my country be favourable. It has received from me, though not more than is due, at least more than was demanded. I prefer being ill rowed under the steerage of another, to steering well with such ungrateful rowers. But these things may be discussed better when we meet. Now hear the answer to your inquiry. I intend to go from Formianum to Antium the third of May; from Antium I wish to go to Tusculanum on the seventh of May. But as soon as I leave Formianum, where I mean to stay till the end of April, I will immediately let you know. Terentia sends her compliments. The young Cicero salutes the Athenian Titus².

(Græc. xii.)

LET those men⁴ deny, if they can, that Publius has been made a plebeian. It is a mere exercise of sovereignty, and is not to be borne. Let but Publius send persons to attest it, and I will swear that our Cæsar, when he was colleague with Balbus, told me at Antium, that himself had conducted the auspices on the occasion. What two charming letters have been delivered to me from you, both at the same time! I do not know what remuneration I can make for them; but that some is due I freely acknowledge. Observe the concurrence of circumstances. I had just gone from the Antian into the Appian road at the Tres Tabernæ, on the festival of Ceres⁵, when my friend Curio, coming from Rome, met me. At the same place presently came the servant from you with letters. Curio asked me if I had heard no news. I said, no. Publius (says he) is canvassing for the place of tribune of the people. What think you? He is very angry with Cæsar, and threatens to rescind all his acts. How does Cæsar receive it?

² Cicero concludes with a Greek form of salutation from his son to Atticus, whose prænomen was Titus.

⁴ The triumvirs, between whom and Clodius there was now the appearance of disagreement.

¹ The place here meant is Bais, situated in the bay of Naples. See book i. letter 1d.

⁷ Cicero uses an epithet familiarly applied by Homer to Juno. He means by it to designate Clodia, who, perhaps, might be full-eyed, which the word signifies; and, besides, resembled Juno in cohabiting, as it was suspected, with her brother Clodius.

⁸ That is, if the conspiracy against Cicero should be broken up, he may be at his ease.

¹² Cæsar, Crassus, and Pompeius.

said I. He denies that he proposed anything about his adoption. Then Curio declared his own hatred⁴, and that of Memmius and Metellus Nepos. I took my leave of the young man, and hastened to your letters. Where are they, who speak of viva voce information? How much more fully have I learned from your letters, than from his conversation, what was doing, what were the daily surmises, the intention of Publius, the trumpet of Bôopis¹, the standard-bearer Athenio, the letters sent to Cnæus, the conversation of Theophanes and of Memmius. Besides, what an expectation have you given me of that licentious feast! I am dying with curiosity. Yet I shall be satisfied without your writing me an account of that meeting, as I wish rather to hear it from your own mouth. As to your exhortation to write something; the materials indeed increase upon me, as you say; but the whole thing is yet in fermentation, and "during the autumn the wine is thick:" when it is settled, what I may write will be better digested. But if you cannot have anything at present, at least you shall be the first to have it, and for some time the only one. You do well to like Dicaearchus: he is an honest man, and not a little better citizen than those rulers of iniquity². I have written this letter on the festival of Ceres, at four in the afternoon, the moment I had read yours; but with the intention of despatching it to-morrow by the first person I meet³. Terentia is delighted with your letter, and sends her kindest regards; and Cicero the philosopher⁵ salutes the statesman Titus.

LETTER XI.

(Græv. x.)

PRAY admire my firmness. I do not mean to attend the games at Antium⁶; for it carries with it an appearance of inconsistency, while I wish to avoid every suspicion of luxury, suddenly to be seen travelling not only delicately, but unbecomingly. I shall therefore wait for you in Formianum till the 7th of May. Let me know what day I may expect to see you. From Appii Forum, 10 P. M. I despatched another letter a little before from the Tres Tabernæ⁷.

⁴ Hatred of the power assumed by Cæsar.

¹ This is meant of Clodia, [see letter 9 of this book,] who was urging her brother to extremities, as it were with a clarion or war-trumpet. The same figure is continued in applying to Athenio the term of standard-bearer of sedition: Athenio had been the author of an insurrection in Sicily. Under this name Cicero probably means Vatinius.

² In Greek δύραλοι, which it is impossible to translate so as to preserve the opposition to the name Dicaearchus; the latter signifying "a ruler of justice;" the former "rulers of iniquity."

⁶ See letter 8 of this book.

⁷ The Appii Forum and Tres Tabernæ derive an interest from the mention of these places in St. Paul's journey to Rome, Acts xviii. 15.

LETTER XII.

(Græv. xi.)

To tell you the truth, I seem as if I were banished since I have been in Formianum. While I was at Antium there was no day on which I did not know better what was doing at Rome, than those who were living there. For your letters acquainted me not only with the state of Rome, but with that of the republic at large; and taught me not only what happened, but also what was going to happen. Now, unless anything is picked up from a casual passenger, I can hear nothing. Therefore, though I hope very soon to see you, yet let me have, by the servant, whom I have directed immediately to come back, some long letter, full not only of all that has been done, but likewise of your own opinions. Take care to let me know the day when you mean to leave Rome. I intend to remain in Formianum till the sixth of May. If you do not arrive before that day, I shall perhaps see you at Rome. For why should I invite you to Arpinum, "a rugged place (as Ulysses says of Ithaca,)" but a good nurse of youths; than which nothing can in my eyes be more delicious." So much for the present. Farewell.

LETTER XIII.

A PROVOKING circumstance, that nobody should have delivered the letter¹ I wrote to you from Tres Tabernæ the same hour that I received your most acceptable intelligence. But you must know that the parcel in which it was contained was taken to my house² the same day on which I sent it, and from thence was brought back to me at Formianum. I have ordered this letter again to be taken to you, that you might be assured of the pleasure yours had given me. When you inform me that nothing is said in Rome³, this is what I expected. But, I can tell you, people are not reserved in the country, nor can the country bear your⁴ tyranny. But if you come into this Telepylus Læstrygonia⁵ (Formiæ I mean), what a noise do people make! How irritated are their minds! In what detestation is our friend Magnus⁶, whose appellation of Great begins to decay with that of the Rich Crassus. Believe me, I have yet met with nobody who could bear this state of things so quietly as I do. Therefore pray let us continue to enjoy our philosophical retirement; for I can aver upon my oath, that

² This is the tenth letter of this book.

³ This must have been his house at Rome.

⁴ That is, nothing was said of the authority usurped by the triumvirate.

⁵ By "your tyranny" is to be understood that which was exercised by the triumvirs at Rome, where Atticus was staying.

⁷ A name given to Pompeius, and signifying Great. See book i. letter 20.

there is nothing worth contending for. If you have got your letters to the Sicyonians*, hasten down to Formianum. I think of leaving it the sixth of May.

LETTER XIV.

How great an expectation do you raise in me about the discourse of Bibulus! How great about the conversation of Böopis! How great also about that dainty entertainment! Come, then, yourself to my thirsty ears. Though there is now nothing which I should think more to be apprehended, than that our Sampaiceramus* when he perceives that he is lashed by the discourses of all people, and sees these proceedings so easily overset, may begin to rush into violent counsels. For my own part, I am dispirited to that degree, that I prefer being enslaved in this indolence, in which I now pine away, to contending with the best hope of success.

In the way of composition, to which you often exhort me, nothing can be done. I live in a court-house, not in a villa, owing to the throng of the Formians; for this Æmilian tribe would fill a court-house^b. But I say nothing of the generality, who after ten o'clock cease to trouble me. But, then, C. Arrius is my nearest neighbour; nay, he is now my very comrade, who even refuses to go to Rome, that he may philosophise here with me all the day long. On the other side is Sebosus, that friend of Catulus. Which way can I turn myself? I would assuredly go immediately to Arpinum, if I did not perceive that you might be expected with most convenience in Formianum; but only till the sixth of May. For see to what people my attention is given up. It would be a fine opportunity if anybody wished now to purchase my Formian estate, while these people are about me. And should I still attempt anything? Let us forsooth undertake some great work, of much research and leisure! Nevertheless, I will endeavour to satisfy you, and will not spare my own pains.

LETTER XV.

I SEE, as you tell me, that things are not less uncertain in the state than they are represented in your letter; but that very variety of reports and

* I have given to this passage an interpretation something different from that commonly received, because I thought it more consonant to the usual phraseology of the ancient Romans, and to his own feelings, expressed in letter 8 of this book:—"Allud agamus."

* Atticus had not been able to get from the people of Sicyon the tributes which he had rented. [See book I. letter 19.] He appears to have staid in Rome to solicit letters to the Sicyonians for the payment of this money.

^a It is generally agreed, that by this name, which recurs in several subsequent letters, is to be understood Pompeius. The name occurs in Josephus as king of the Æmæi, perhaps a prince conquered by Pompeius. It cannot but strike every reader, that the names under which he is mentioned in these letters should be so various, and often so extraordinary; perhaps in derision of some affected grandeur.

^b So I understand the text of the original, which is by no means clear, and may possibly be corrupt. Literally—"But what an Æmilian tribe (have I) equal to a court-house?" The people of Formia being reckoned in the Æmilian tribe, are therefore called by that name.

opinions delights me, for I seem to be in Rome when I read your letters; and, as it always happens in affairs of such magnitude, to hear sometimes one thing, sometimes another. There is one circumstance I cannot comprehend, what he can possibly devise for carrying into effect the Agrarian scheme without any opposition. What results from that firmness of Bibulus in the postponement of the comitia, besides the exposition of his own opinion, without any correction of the evils of the republic? Our hope, then, is in Publius. Let him, let him be made a tribune of the people; if for nothing else, that you may the sooner come back from Epirus (for I take it for granted that nothing will prevent your going thither^c), especially if he wishes for any contention with me. For I do not doubt, if there should be anything of this kind, you will hasten up. But if this should not be the case, whether he rush on to his own ruin, or whether he retrieve the condition of the state, I propose to myself a noble sight, if only it is permitted me to see it with you by my side.

As I was writing this, in comes Sebosus. I had hardly felt my vexation, when "Good morning," says Arrius. This is getting away from Rome! From whom is it I have escaped to fall into such hands? I must go "to my cradle and native hills^d." In short, if I cannot be alone, I will rather live among mere rustics than with these mighty civil people. However, as you say nothing certain about your motions, I will wait for you in Formianum till the fifth of May. Your attention and diligence in the Malvian dispute^e is extremely gratifying to Terentia. She is not aware that you are supporting the common cause of all who occupy the public lands. But you still pay something to the collectors of the revenue; she refuses even that. Both she, and the aristocratical^f boy Cicero, send their compliments.

LETTER XVI.

THE thirtieth of April, as I was dozing after dinner, your letter was delivered to me, in which you speak of the Campanian lands^g. What think you? In the first place, it struck me in such a manner as effectually to remove my sleep; but this was through thoughtfulness rather than uneasiness. And the result of my thoughts is this; first, from what you had mentioned in a former letter, of having heard from one of Cæsar's friends that something was to be brought forward to which nobody would object; I had apprehended something greater. This did not appear to be of that kind. Then, for my consolation, all expectation of the Agrarian bounty seems to have centred in the ^c The meaning of the original has been variously understood. I have ventured to interpret it in a manner different from any that I have seen, and which appears to me sufficiently consonant with the Latin idiom, and with the context.

^e This evidently relates to the leases of the public lands; but the particular meaning of the term is not known.

^f The expression indicates that the young Cicero was already zealous in behalf of the best interests of the republic.

^g A distribution of this land was to be made to the people.

Campanian land; which, at ten acres a-piece, cannot maintain above five thousand men. All the remaining multitude must necessarily be alienated from them^b. Besides, if there is any one thing more calculated than another to inflame the minds of good men, it is certainly this; and the more so, because the port duties being removed, and the Campanian land distributed, what domestic revenue remains besides the twentieth^c? and this I suppose will, in one little meeting, be extinguished by the shouts of a mob. What our Cneus intends, I know not, that he could be wrought to such a pitch: "for he now breathes through no little flagoelet, but with a full breath untampered by a reed^d." Hitherto he pretended to approve Cæsar's laws, but to leave it to him to defend his acts: that he liked the Agrarian law; but whether intercession could be made or not was no business of his: that he was glad to have the affair of the king of Alexandria^e at length concluded; but whether Bibulus had been observing the heavens^f or not, it was not his duty to inquire: that on the subject of the farmers of the revenue, he had wished to favour the order of knights; but that it was impossible for him to guess what would happen if Bibulus came down to the forum^g. But now, Sampsiceramus, what will you say? that if you have taken away from us the tribute of the Campanian land, you have appointed it to be levied on Mount Libanus^h? But how will you support this reasoning? I will keep you, says he, in subjection by Cæsar's army. But in truth you will not subject me so much by that army, as by the ungrateful spirits of those people who bear the name of good, but who have returned me no thanks, no recompense of reward, or even of good words. Should I put myself forward against that faction, I might yet find some means of opposing them. I have now made this resolution, that as there is so great a controversy between your friend Diccæarchus, and my friend Theophrastusⁱ, the former preferring a life of business, the latter one of speculation, I will comply with both. Diccæarchus I have abundantly satisfied already; I now turn to that party which not only allows me to be quiet, but reproves me for not having always been so. Let us then, O my Titus, address ourselves to those noble studies; and at length return thither, from whence we ought never to have departed. What you say of my brother Quintus's letter to you, was equally true of that to me: it was "a lion in front, and behind^j." I do not know what to call it; for at the beginning he deprecates his stay^k in such a manner as to be quite affecting; presently he is so easy about it as to desire me to correct and publish his annals. wish to direct your attention to what he says about the coast duties, and that he had, by the advice of his council, referred the business to the senate. It appears that he had not yet read my letter, in which, after due consideration, I had explained to him that they ought not to be exacted. I should be glad, if any Greeks^l have yet come to Rome upon that account, that you would see them, and, if you think proper, would let them know my sentiments upon it. If I can manage so that this good cause may not be lost in the senate, I will endeavour to satisfy the renters^m: but if not (I must speak openly with you), I prefer satisfying all Asia, and the traders; for it is also of great importance to them. This I consider myself bound to do. But you will see about it. Pray, do the questors hesitate even about paying in cistophoriⁿ? For, after having tried everything, I must be content with this ultimate resource, if there is no other. I shall be glad to see you in Arpinatum, and will give you a country welcome, since you despise this by the sea-side.

LETTER XVII.

JUST as you say, so I find it: Sampsiceramus is disturbed: there is nothing that may not be apprehended. He is confessedly preparing the way to tyranny. For, what means that sudden alliance^o? what means the distribution of the Campanian land? or the money that is squandered? If this were all, it would be more than enough; but such is the nature of the thing, that it cannot end here. For how should this afford any pleasure? They never would have brought matters to such a state, but for the sake of opening a way to other mischievous counsels. Ye immortal gods! But, as you say, in Arpinatum, about the thirteenth of May, we will not bewail these matters, lest all the time and attention we have bestowed on literature be lost; but we will calmly confer together. Nor do I, as formerly, derive consolation so much from any good hopes, as from indifference, which I exercise in nothing so much as in regard to civil and public affairs. Besides, I have a little vanity and conceit (it is well to know one's own faults), which is in some measure flattered; for it used to sting me to think, that, some six hundred years hence, the deserts of Sampsiceramus towards his country might eclipse my own. There is now no longer room for this apprehension; for he is so sunk, that Phocia Curiana^p is honourable in comparison. But of this when we meet. You seem to me, however, likely to be at Rome at the time of my arrival, which I shall not be sorry for, if it put you to no inconvenience. But if you do come, as you say, I wish you could get out from Theophrastus how Alabarches^q is disposed towards me. You will make inquiry, therefore, with your usual accuracy, and bring me from him some documents,

LETTER XVIII.

I HAVE received several letters from you, by which I find with what doubtfulness and anxiety of mind you wish to be informed what news there is. We are beset on all sides: and we now no longer refuse to be enslaved; but dread death and banishment as greater evils; which are in truth much inferior ones. And this state, which all with one voice deplore, is not relieved by a word from anybody. It is the aim of those in power, as I suspect, to leave nobody any favour to bestow. The young Curio^x alone speaks out, and openly opposes them: he receives the greatest applause, is saluted in public with great honour, and has shown him many other marks of kindness; while Pufius^y is persecuted with hootings, reproaches, and hisses. From hence no hope is to be derived, but only the greater grief, when you perceive the will of the city free; its courage fettered: and that you may not have to ask after each particular in detail, the whole is reduced to such a state, that there is no hope, not only that individuals, but even that the magistrates can long remain free. But amidst this oppression, conversation, at least in private circles and companies, is less reserved than it was. Our grief begins to overcome our fear; yet so, that all is overwhelmed with despair. Even the Campanian law contains a denunciation, in the assembly of the candidates, against anybody who shall presume to mention any other occupation of the land, than as it is proposed by the Julian laws. The other candidates do not hesitate to swear to these conditions; Laterensis is thought to have acted wisely, in ceasing to solicit the tribunate, that he might not be obliged to swear. But I do not care to say anything more about the republic: I vex myself, and cannot write without the greatest pain. I support myself, considering this state of oppression, not dejectedly; considering what I have formerly done, not at all courageously.

I am very kindly invited by Cæsar into his province, as his lieutenant: a free lieutenancy is also given me under colour of a vow^z. But this is not a sufficient security in the moderate counsels of this pretty youth^a; and banishes me from my brother when he arrives: the former is safer, and does not prevent my coming up, when I wish it. I hold this, but do not think I shall make use of it; and nobody knows it. I do not like to run away: I wish to fight^b. The affections of people are very great: but I do not speak positively. You will keep this to yourself.

Respecting the manumission of Statius^c, and some other matters, I am sorry indeed, but am now grown callous. I should be glad, or rather I should wish, that you were here: I should then want neither counsel, nor comfort. Be ready however, that if I call for you, you may fly to me.

LETTER XIX.

MANY things give me uneasiness, both from so great a commotion in the republic, and from the dangers which beset me individually, and are six hundred fold. But nothing vexes me more than the manumission of Statius: "that neither my authority; but I omit authority; not even my displeasure, should be respected^d." I do not know what it is right to do: not that there is so much in the thing itself, as in the conversation it excites. I cannot be angry with those whom I greatly love; but I am sorry, indeed very sorry. As for other matters of more importance, as the threats of Clodius, and the struggles which are prepared for me, they affect me but little; for I conceive that I shall be able either to bear them with becoming dignity, or to avoid them without vexation. You will say perhaps, "enough of dignity; as they said of acorns, when they had found better food^e;" think, I beseech you, of your safety." Alas! why are you not here? nothing would escape you. I am perhaps blinded, and am too much given up to a sense of honour. Be assured, nothing ever was so disgraceful, so base, so offensive to all orders, ranks, and ages, as this present state of affairs: more so than I could wish, not only that I could have expected. Those courtiers of the populace have now taught even moderate people to hiss. Bibulus is extolled to the skies. I know not why; but he is so praised, as if "he alone by his check restored the state to us^f." Pompeius, my beloved, who now is my greatest pain, has been his own ruin: he retains not one supporter. I doubt whether it be through inclination, or fear, that he is obliged to join with them. For my own part, I neither fight with that cause, because of the friendship that subsists between us; nor do I approve it, lest I should condemn all that I have formerly done. I manage as I can. The sense of the people is clearly seen in the theatre, and public shows: for in the exhibition of gladiators, now the master, then the assistants^g, were cut with hisses. In the Apollinarian games, Diphilus, the actor, attacked our friend Pompeius with petulance. He was obliged to repeat a thousand times that sentence, "you are great by our wretchedness:" and that—"the time will come when you will rue that courage," he pronounced with the shout of the whole theatre; and so of the rest: for the lines are such, that they seemed to have been composed for the occasion by some enemy of Pompeius. "If neither laws nor morals compel," &c. was spoken amidst great shouts of applause. After Cæsar had come in amidst a dead applause^b, the young Curio followed, and was cheered, as Pompeius used to be in the days of the republic. Cæsar was greatly disturbed. Letters were said to be hastily despatched to Pompeius at Capua: they^c were angry with the knights who stood up to applaud Curio: they were at enmity with all the people; they threatened the Roscian law^d and even the corn law^e. It was altogether a confused business. For my part, I should have liked better that their attempts might pass over in silence; but I fear this is impossible. People do not bear what however it seems necessary to bear: but there is now one general voice amongst all, confirmed by hatred, rather than by security. In the mean time our Publius threatens me, and is an open enemy. There hangs over me that business, for which you will fly up^f. I believe I have that consular host of all good men, even of all moderately good, firmly attached to me. Pompeius professes no common regard for me: at the same time he affirms that Clodius will not utter a word about me; in which he does not deceive me, but is himself deceived. Cosconius being dead, I am invited to fill his place in the commission for dividing the lands; that is, to supply the place of a dead man. Nothing would be more disgraceful for me in the eyes of men; nor would anything be less calculated for the very purpose of security. For these commissioners are ill looked upon by the good; so that while I retained the ill-will of the worst part of society, I should add to it that of the others. Cæsar wishes me to be his lieutenant. This would be a more honourable way of avoiding danger; but I now refuse this. How is it then? I choose rather to fight: however there is yet nothing determined. I repeat, that I wish you were here; but, however if there is any necessity, I shall send for you. What more? what? it is this, that we may depend upon all being lost. For why should I so long dissemble the truth? but I write this in haste, and with some reserve. Hereafter I will either write everything plainly to you, if I can find a trusty messenger to whom I may deliver my letters; or if I am obliged to write obscurely, yet you will understand it. In these letters I shall call myself Lælius, and you Furius: the rest will be in enigmas. I here diligently cultivate, and pay respect to Cæcilius^g. I hear that the edicts of Bibulus have been sent to you. Our Pompeius is burning with vexation and rage on their account.

regard with which you mentioned him; Cæcilius I support in every way that I am able; Varro^a gives me great satisfaction; Pompeius has a real love and affection towards me. Do you believe it? you will say. I do believe it; his conduct persuades me of it. But as I perceive practical writers, in all historical maxims, and even in verse, advise us to be cautious, and forbid to be credulous; I shall do one of these two, and be cautious; the other, not to believe, I cannot do. Clodius still denounces danger to me. Pompeius affirms that there is no danger; nay, he swears it; and adds even that he would sooner be killed himself, than I should be hurt. The affair is yet unsettled: as soon as anything is determined, I will let you know. If it is necessary to fight, I shall summon you to share my troubles: if I am permitted to be quiet, I will not disturb you from your Amalthea. I shall write to you very briefly upon public affairs; for I fear lest the paper itself should betray me. Hereafter therefore, if I have occasion to write more fully to you, I shall veil it in allegory. The state is dying by a new disease; so that while all people blame what is done, complain, grieve, entertain no difference of opinion, and even speak out, and openly lament; yet no remedy is offered. For we believe that no resistance can be made, which is not fatal; and that there is no end of yielding, besides ruin. Bibulus is exalted to the skies with the admiration and favour of the people, who copy and read his edicts and speeches. He is arrived at the height of glory by a new method; for nothing is now so popular, as hatred of the popular leaders: I fear what may be the issue of this. If I begin to see anything, I will write to you more openly. If you love me, as indeed you do, keep yourself in readiness, that you may come up if I call: but I endeavour (and shall do so) to prevent the necessity of it. As to what I said about calling you Furius, there is no need of changing your name. I shall make myself Lælius, and you Atticus; and I shall not use my own hand, or seal, provided the letters be of a kind which I should be sorry to have fall into other hands. Diodotus is dead: he has left me, perhaps, a hundred sesteria^c (800*l.*). Bibulus has put off the comitia, by an Archilochian^d edict, to the seventeenth of October. I have received the books from Vibius^e. He is a poor poet; and yet has some information: but upon the whole is not without his use. I shall have it transcribed, and send it back.

LETTER XXI.

ON the subject of the republic why should I write to you minutely? The whole is ruined: and in one respect is more wretched than you left it; for then the tyranny which oppressed the state ^d Archilochus was a severe satirist, so that the expression signifies that these edicts reflected severely upon the triumvirate.

^e It appears by the following letter, that these books contained the poems of Alexander. It is probable that Atticus might have sent them to Cicero by Vibius.

seemed at least to be liked by the common people ; and though a cause of trouble to the better sort, yet it did not threaten their ruin. Now it has suddenly become so hateful to every body, that I dread to think where it may burst forth ; for we have already experienced the rage and intemperance of those men, who in their anger against Cato* have overturned everything. But then they used such gentle poisons, that it seemed as if we might die without agony ; now I fear they will be rendered outrageous by the hisses of the populace, the language of the respectable citizens, the clamour of Italy. I had hoped, indeed, as I often used to say to you, that the wheel of the republic was so turned, as scarcely to be heard, scarcely to leave a track ; and so it would have been, if people could have waited to let the storm pass over : but after smothering their groans a long time, at last all have begun to speak, and to cry aloud ; so that my friend†, unused to reproach, always conversant with praise, and surrounded with glory, knows not where to turn himself in his present squalid appearance and broken spirit. He sees it dangerous to proceed, weak to retreat ; he has made good people his enemies, and has not even the bad for his friends. See now my tenderness of mind : I could not refrain from tears when I saw him, on the 22nd of July, addressing the people upon the edicts of Bibulus ; him, I say, who formerly used magnificently to exalt himself in that very place, with the greatest affection of the people, and universal applause. How was he then humbled ! how dejected ! how did he displease not only his audience, but himself also ! O spectacle ! agreeable to Crassus alone, not so to others. For having descended as it were, from the stars, it seemed a fall, rather than any advance. And as Apelles, if he saw his Venus, or Protegenes his Jalyus, smeared with mud, would, I conceive, feel great pain : so did I with great pain behold him, whom I had painted and polished with all the colours of art, suddenly disfigured. Though nobody thought I owed him any friendship for his conduct in the Clodian business ; yet such was my regard, that it was not to be exhausted by any act of unkindness. Bibulus's Archilochian edicts against him are so acceptable to the populace, that one cannot pass by the place where they are exhibited, for the throng of people who are reading them : to him they are so bitter, that he pines with vexation : to me they are distressing, because they give too much uneasiness to one whom I have always loved ; and I am afraid lest one so powerful, so active with his sword, and so unaccustomed to insult, should give way to grief and rage with all the force of his mind. What is likely to be the end of Bibulus, I cannot say ; at present he is in surprising glory. Upon his putting off the comitia to the month of October, Cæsar imagined that, this being a measure usually offensive to the people, he should be able, by addressing them, to persuade the assembly itself to go to Bibulus ; but after uttering many very seditious expressions, he could not extract from them a single word. What say you ? the triumvirs feel that they have the good-will of no party : so much the more reason have we to be afraid. Clodius is my declared enemy. Pompeius affirms that he will do nothing against me : it is dangerous to believe this ; therefore I prepare myself to resist him. I trust I shall have the best wishes of all orders. When the time comes, not only I shall want you, but the circumstances themselves will call for you : I shall gain a great deal of advice, of courage, and of protection, if I have you with me at that time. Varro gives me satisfaction ; Pompeius talks divinely. I hope I shall certainly be able to come off either with distinguished credit, or without mortification. Let me know what you are doing, how you amuse yourself, and how you have managed with the Sicyonians‡.

LETTER XXII.

How I could wish that you had remained in Rome ! you would certainly have remained, if we could have foreseen what has happened : we could easily restrain our pretty youth§, or at least we should be able to know what he was about. But now, this is the state of the business ; he flies about, raves, follows no certain course, threatens many, and seemingly to act as chance may offer. When he sees the odium attached to the present state of affairs, he seems as if he would attack those who have occasioned it ; but when again he recollects their influence, and the strength of their army, he directs himself against me ; and to me he threatens both violence and prosecution. With him Pompeius has discoursed ; and, as he informed me himself, (for I have no other witness,) discoursed with vehemence, telling him that he should incur the utmost disgrace of perfidy and wickedness, if any danger should be brought upon me by him, whom he had himself invested with arms, when he suffered him to be made a plebeian ; but that he, and Appius, had received his promise on my behalf, and that if he did not observe it, he should resent it so, that the world might know nothing was dearer to him than my friendship. After saying this, and much more to the same purpose, he told me that Clodius first continued for some time to urge many things on the other side ; but at last gave up, and declared that he would do nothing contrary to Pompeius's wishes. Since then, however, he has not ceased to speak very severely of me ; and if he did not, still I should not trust him, but should prepare for everything, as I do. Now I conduct myself so, that every day my friends and my influence increase. I keep altogether clear from public concerns, and am busily engaged in causes, and the exertions of the forum. This I perceive is agreeable not only to those who use my assistance, but to the people generally. My house is frequented ; I am saluted ; the remembrance of my consulship is renewed. The favour of the people is manifest ; and I am in such hope, as sometimes to think the struggle which hangs over me is not a thing to be declined. I have now need of your advice, your affection, and fidelity ; therefore fly up ; every thing will be easy to me, if I have but you. Much may be done through our friend Varro ; but it will be strengthened by your support. Much may be got from Publius himself ; much may be known, which cannot be kept secret from

* The stern supporter of old principles. With Cato must be supposed to be included other inflexible politicians of the same time.

you; much also—but it is idle to enumerate each particular; I shall then want you for everything. Be assured of this, that everything will be plain when I see you; but all depends upon its being before he enters upon his office. While Crassus is urging Pompeius, I imagine if you are here (who by means of Böopis* may learn from Clodius himself with what sincerity they are acting) I shall either be free from trouble, or, at least, free from error: you do not need my entreaty and exhortation. You see what my wishes, what the occasion, what the importance of the case requires. Of the republic I have nothing to write to you, but the great hatred of all people towards those who have possessed themselves of everything; yet no hope of any change. But, as you may easily perceive, Pompeius is tired, and heartily repents. I cannot sufficiently foresee what issue is to be expected; but these rancours must assuredly burst forth somewhere. I have sent back to you the books of Alexander; a careless writer, and no good poet, yet not without his use. I have willingly received Numerius Numestius into my friendship, and have found him a sensible and prudent man, and worthy of your recommendation.

LETTER XXIII.

I BELIEVE you never before received a letter from me that was not written in my own hand. From that you may judge how much I am occupied: for having no spare time, and yet being obliged to walk about for the sake of recruiting my voice, I dictate this as I walk. In the first place then I would have you know, that our friend Sampsiceramus is heartily sick of his situation, and wishes he could again be restored to that place, from which he has fallen. He imparts to me his uneasiness, and sometimes openly seeks a remedy; which it is impossible for me to find. Then, all the authors and adherents of that faction are losing their vigour; while there never was a more general consent in the wishes and expressions of all people. As for myself (for I know you will be glad to be informed), I interfere in no public counsels, and give myself up altogether to the business and labour of the forum; by which, as may easily be supposed, I am brought to the frequent relation, and regret, of my former deeds. But that kinsman of our Böopis casts no little terror, and threatens; and while he denies it to Sampsiceramus, to others he professes and boasts of it; therefore if you love me, as indeed you do, if you are asleep, wake up; if you are standing, walk; if you are walking, run; if running, fly. It is not to be believed how much (which is the most possible) I place in your counsels and prudence, how much in your affection and fidelity. The greatness of the occasion requires perhaps a long discourse; but to minds so united as ours, a few words are sufficient. It is of great importance to me, if you cannot be at Rome on the comitia, at least that you may be there when he is declared tribune. Farewell.

LETTER XXIV.

In the letter I sent by Numestius, I called upon you with an earnestness and vehemence, which nothing could exceed; to that call add even, if you can, something more. Do not make yourself uneasy (for I know you, and am aware of the solicitude and anxiety inseparable from real affection); but the case, as I hope, is less formidable in fact, than it seems in the relation. Vettius (the same who gave information at the time of my consulship) had promised Caesar, that he would contrive to bring the young Curio into some suspicion of criminality. He therefore insinuated himself into the familiarity of the young man; and having, as it appears, frequent meetings with him, he at length brought matters to such a state, that he declared his determination to assault Pompeius with the assistance of his slaves, and to kill him. Information of this was given by Curio to his father, and by him to Pompeius. The affair was brought before the senate. Vettius being introduced, at first denied that he had ever been concerned with Curio; but this did not last long: for he presently demanded a public pledge of security upon his giving evidence; this was not opposed. Then he gave out, that there had been a band of young men under the conduct of Curio; amongst whom had originally been Paullus, and Q. Cæpio Brutus, and Lentulus, the son of the flamen, not without the knowledge of his father; that afterwards C. Septimius, the secretary of Bibulus, had brought him a dagger from Bibulus: which was all absurd; as if Vettius would have been without a dagger, unless the consul had given him one! And this was the more scouted, because on the 13th of May Bibulus had warned Pompeius that he ought to be upon his guard, and Pompeius had thanked him for it. Young Curio being introduced, deposed in answer to what Vettius had said; and Vettius was then chiefly convicted by his own assertion, that it had been the advice of the young men to attack Pompeius in the forum with the gladiators of Gabinus; and that Paullus was at the head of it; though it was known that he was at that time in Macedonia. A decree of the senate was then passed, that Vettius should be put in prison for having confessed that he had carried arms; and that whoever liberated him would be an enemy to the republic. The general opinion of this affair was, that it had been designed Vettius and his slaves should have been apprehended in the forum with a dagger and with arms; and then he should have offered to confess. And this would have been done, if the Curios had not previously given information to Pompeius. The decree of the senate was then read in the assembly of the people; but the next day Cæsar, who formerly, when he was prætor, had obliged Q. Cælius to speak from below^w, now brought Vettius forwards on the rostra, and placed him in a situation, to which the consul Bibulus was not permitted to aspire^x. Here he said whatever he pleased about the republic; and having come ready prepared, he first omitted any mention of Cæpio, whom he had named with acrimony in the senate; so that it was manifest the night, and some nightly management, had intervened; in the next place, he named some, whom in the senate he had not touched with the slightest suspicion; as Lucullus, from whom he said C. Fannius used to be sent to him; the same who had set his name to the accusation of P. Clodius; also L. Domitius, whose house had been fixed upon as the place from whence their eruption might be made. He did not name me; but mentioned that a certain speaker, of consular rank, and neighbour to the consul⁷, had suggested to him, that some Ahala Servilius⁸, or Brutus⁹, must be found. He added at last, upon being called back by Vatinius, after the assembly was dismissed, that he had understood from Curio, that my son-in-law Piso, and M. Laterensis, were privy to these machinations. Vettius was at this time charged before Crassus Dives for violence; and upon being found guilty, meant to claim the benefit of turning evidence; which if he had obtained, it was probable several trials would have followed. This did not much alarm me, who, however, am not used to disregard anything. Indeed, I had the strongest marks of favour shown me; but I am quite weary of my life, so full are all things of all sorts of miseries. A little while ago we had been apprehensive of a massacre, which the speech of that firm old man Q. Considius¹⁰ had dispelled; that which we might have apprehended every day, has suddenly sprung up. What think you? Nothing is more unfortunate than I; nothing more fortunate than Catulus¹¹, both from the splendour of his life, and from the character of these times. Yet in the midst of these calamities, I preserve a firm and unruffled mind, and maintain my dignity honourably and carefully. Pompeius bids me lay aside all uneasiness on the subject of Clodius; and on every occasion professes the greatest kindness towards me; but I want you to direct my counsels, to share my anxieties, and to take part in all my thoughts. Therefore, as I desired Numestius to use his influence with you, so I beg you even more earnestly, if possible, to fly up to us. I shall get new life if I see you.

⁷ Cicero's house in Rome was not far from Caesar's.

⁸ Ahala Servilius had killed Sp. Melius on suspicion of aspiring to kingly power.

⁹ Brutus, as is well known, had been the cause of Tarquinius's being driven from the throne, and of the extinction of the regal power.

¹⁰ Caesar had committed some acts of violence, and had filled the assembly with armed men, when the law was to be passed which gave him the government of Gaul for five years. Many senators absented themselves; but Considius came forward, saying, that he was too old to fear death.

¹¹ Q. Catulus had died the year before.

LETTER XXV.

WHEN I commend one of your friends to you, I like him to know from you, that I have done so. As lately, when I wrote to you of Varro's attention to me, you said in return that you were very glad of it; but I would rather you had written to him, to assure him that I was sensible of his kindness; not so much because he actually gave me satisfaction, as that he might continue to do it; for, as you know, he has wonderfully moderated those involved and unwholesome counsels. But I observe that maxim, that it is necessary to bear the extravagances of those who are in power: while your other friend Hortensius⁴, with how full a hand, how nobly, how eloquently has he raised to the stars my praises, in speaking of the pretorship of Flaccus, and that time of the Allobroges! Believe me, nothing could have been said more kindly, more honourably, or more copiously. I wish you would write to inform him that I have mentioned this to you. But why should you write? when I imagine you are coming yourself, and are almost here; so much have I urged you in former letters. I very much look for you, very much want you; and not I, more than the cause itself, and the time, call for you. On the present state of affairs what should I write to you, but a repetition of the same thing? Nothing can be more hopeless than the condition of the republic; nothing more hated than those who have occasioned it. So far as belief, and hope, and conjecture go, I am supported by the strongest favour of all people. Fly up, therefore; you will either extricate me from all uneasiness, or you will share it with me. I am the shorter, because I hope we shall very soon be at liberty personally to converse together as we please. Farewell.

⁴ In the original it is Hortalus, which was one of the names of Hortensius; but being less commonly known, I have not thought fit to preserve it in the translation.

[In the interval between this and the following letters, Atticus went up to Rome at his friend's request. Clodius in the mean time having been appointed tribune of the people, spared no means to gain the populace, and at length promulgated a decree against such as had put to death a Roman citizen without the sentence of the people. This was evidently levelled at Cicero's conduct in the suppression of the Catilinarian conspiracy; upon which, seeing the disposition of men's minds, he withdrew from the city, and was presently followed by a decree of banishment.]

BOOK III.

LETTER I.

(Græc. iii.)

I WISH I may ever see the day when I shall have reason to thank you for compelling me to preserve my life; hitherto I am very sorry. But I entreat you to come to me immediately at Vibo, to which place many causes have directed me. If you come thither, I shall be able to consult about my whole journey and flight. If you refuse to do this, I shall be surprised; but I trust you will do it.

LETTER II.

THE reason of my coming hither was, that there was no place where I could any longer remain unmolested so well as on Sica's estate; especially while the law for my banishment had not yet been finally amended. At the same time I knew that I could easily go back to Brundisium, if I had you with me; but without you I could not continue in those parts, on account of Autronius¹. Now, as I mentioned to you before, if you come to me, we will consult upon this whole business. I know the journey is troublesome; but this great calamity is full of troubles. My spirits are too much broken, and depressed, to admit of my writing more. Farewell. Dated the 8th of April, from the shores of Lucania.

LETTER III.

(Græv. iv.)

I WOULD have you attribute it to my misfortunes, rather than to fickleness, that I have suddenly left Vibo, whither I had invited you; for I have received a draft of the law for my ruin; by which I find that the amendment I had heard of, permits me to remain at any place exceeding the distance of four hundred miles. But not being permitted to go where I had intended¹, I immediately turned my course towards Brundisium, previously to the passing of the law, lest I might involve Sica, with whom I was staying, in my ruin; and also because I was not suffered to be at Malta. Now make haste to join me, if only I can meet with any one to take me in. Hitherto I have met with a kind reception; but I am apprehensive of what is to come. I repent, my Pomponius, of being yet alive; in which matter you have principally influenced me. But of this when we meet: only manage to come.

LETTER IV.

(Græv. i.)

As I before thought it of importance to have you with me,—so especially, upon reading the form of the law, I understood that nothing could happen more desirably for the journey I determined upon, than that you should join me as soon as possible: that after leaving Italy, in case my road should lie through Epirus, I might have your protection and that of your friends; or if anything else were to be done, might regulate my measures by your advice. I beg, therefore, that you will take pains to join me without delay. You may do it the easier, since the law respecting the province of Macedonia² has been passed. I would use further arguments with you, if the state of affairs did not itself speak to you on my behalf.

LETTER V.

TERENTIA often acknowledges her obligations to you in the strongest terms; which is highly gratifying to me. I live in great wretchedness, sided, so as to render it unsafe for him to proceed to Butrothum, (where we may suppose that Atticus had offered him an asylum,) unless he had the protection of Atticus's presence. Brundisium was the port from whence people passed into Greece. Vibo was opposite to Sicily.

¹ Cicero had designed to pass his exile in Sicily or Malta, but being prevented from executing this plan, he determined to go, by the way of Macedonia, into some of the nearest parts of Asia Minor.

² The appointment of the government of Macedonia was probably of some importance to Atticus, on account of his private affairs. It was allotted to the consul Piso, who appears to have been a base, hypocritical man, in the interest of Clodius.

and am worn out with excessive grief. I know not what to say to you: for if you are still in Rome you cannot now come up with me; and if you are on your road, as soon as you have come up with me we shall arrange together what is to be arranged. I only beg that you will continue in the same affection you have always borne me,—for I am still the same. My enemies have taken away from me my goods, but not myself. Farewell. Dated the 10th of April, at Thurium³.

LETTER VI.

I HAD not doubted but I should see you at Tarentum or Brundisium. Many reasons made me wish it; among the rest, that I might stop in Epirus and take your advice on the rest of my affairs. Since this has not happened, I shall place this also in the long catalogue of my misfortunes. I shall proceed into Asia, particularly to Cyzicum⁴. I commend my family to you. I hardly and wretchedly support myself. Dated the 18th of April, from the neighbourhood of Tarentum.

LETTER VII.

I ARRIVED at Brundisium the 18th of April. The same day your servant delivered to me your letter; and, the third day after, another servant brought me another letter. Your kindness in inviting and pressing me to go to your house in Epirus, is very gratifying to me, and nothing new, and what I should wish to do if I might spend my whole time there⁵; for I dislike places that are frequented: I avoid mankind, and can hardly bear to see the light. That retirement would not be unpleasant to me, especially in so familiar a place; but to turn aside for the sake of making an excursion thither, is, in the first place, out of my way; then it would expose me to Autronius, and the rest of that set, for four days' journey,—and would, besides, be without you. For a fortified castle, if I were living there, might be desirable; to a mere passenger would be useless. If I dared I would go to Athens: I certainly should like it: but at this time many of my enemies are there,—and I have not you with me; and I fear they may interpret even that city to be not sufficiently distant from Italy; nor do you say on what day I may expect you. By calling upon me to preserve my life, you produce only this effect,—of preventing me from laying hands on myself; you cannot prevent my repenting of my determination, and of my life: for what is there that should attach me to it? especially if there is no longer that hope which accompanied me in my flight. I will not attempt to enumerate all the miseries into which I have fallen through the extreme malice and wickedness not so much of my enemies as of my eaviers, lest I should exasperate my own grief and bring you into the same distress. This I affirm, that nobody was ever affected with so heavy a calamity, nobody had ever more reason to wish for death,—the most honourable time for which has already passed by; the time that remains may bring an end to my trouble, but not a remedy. On the subject of the republic I see you collect every thing which you think can afford me any hope of a change of circumstances. Little as this is, yet, since you will have it so, let us wait for it. In the mean time, if you make haste you will yet be able to join me; for I shall either go into Epirus or shall pass slowly through Candavia¹. My doubt about Epirus is not owing to my irresolution, but to my uncertainty where I may meet with my brother, whom indeed I know not how I shall be able either to see or to take leave of. This is the greatest and saddest of all my miseries. I would write to you oftener, and more at length, if my grief did not take away all the powers of my mind, and above all the power of writing. I long to see you. Farewell. Dated the 30th of April, at Brundisium.

LETTER VIII.

On leaving Brundisium, I informed you why I did not go into Epirus; because of its vicinity to Greece, which was full of daring enemies, and because the passage out was difficult when I might wish to leave it. Besides this, I received two messages while I was at Dyrrachium¹,—one to say that my brother would go by sea from Ephesus to Athens; the other that he would go by land through Macedonia. I sent therefore to Athens, to desire that he would come from thence to Thessalonica²; and went myself to Thessalonica, where I arrived the 23d of May. I have heard nothing certain about his journey, except that he had a little before left Ephesus. I am now full of alarm about the proceedings at Rome³; for though you tell me, in a letter dated the 15th of May, that you had heard he was likely to be brought to a severe account, and in another letter that things were now more favourable,—yet this last is dated a day earlier than the other, which adds to my uneasiness: so that while my daily trouble distresses and wastes me, this additional vexation leaves me scarcely any life remaining. But the voyage is a very difficult one; and from his uncertainty where I might be, he may perhaps have taken a different course. For Phæto, his freedman, has not seen him; but being driven back by the wind into Macedonia, he met me at Pella. I see how much reason I have to fear what is to come, nor do I know what to say. I am afraid of everything; for there is nothing so miserable that may not happen in my present circumstances. Wretched enough before in my great afflictions and sorrows, with the addition of this apprehension, I remain at Thessalonica in suspense, and have no courage for anything. Now, in answer to your inquiries, I have not seen Trypho Cæcilius. Your conversation with Pompeius I have understood from your letter. I do not see so great a commotion to hang over the republic, as you either see or represent with a view of comforting me; for the business of Tigranes having passed over, all difficulties seem to be removed⁴. You desire me to return thanks to Varro, which I will do, and likewise to Hypæus. I think of following your advice in not going further off till the decrees of May are brought to me, but where I shall remain I am not yet determined; for I am so uneasy about Quintus that I can resolve upon nothing: but I will immediately let you know. From the irresolution apparent in my letters, I imagine you perceive the disturbance of my mind; which, though I am afflicted with an inconceivable and heavy calamity, is not however so much owing to the greatness of my misfortune as to the recollection of my own fault,—for you now see by whose iniquity⁵ I have been led on and betrayed. I wish you had perceived it sooner, and had not, with me, given up your whole mind to grief. When, therefore, you hear of my being oppressed and worn out with sadness, remember that I am more affected with the penalty of my folly than with the event itself; that I should have trusted him without suspecting his wickedness. The sense of my misfortunes, and apprehension for my brother, stop my writing. See after and regulate all these matters. Terentia returns you the greatest thanks. I have sent you a copy of the letter which I wrote to Pompeius. Dated the 29th of May, at Thessalonica.

LETTER IX.

My brother Quintus having left Asia before the first of May and reached Athens on the fifteenth, was obliged to make great haste, that his absence might not expose him to difficulty, in case there should be anybody not yet satisfied with the sum of my misfortunes. I wished him, therefore, rather to hasten to Rome than to come to me. At the same time (for I will confess the truth, from which you may perceive the greatness of my sufferings) I could not bring my mind either to look upon him, who was so tenderly attached to me, under the effect of such affliction, or present before him, and suffer him to behold, my own wretchedness sunk in grief, and my ruined condition. I dreaded also, what would certainly have happened, that he might be unable to quit me. I contemplated the time when he would either be obliged to dismiss his lictors⁶, or would be forcibly torn from my embrace. The effect of this bitterness I have avoided by another bitterness, of not seeing my brother. You, who made me preserve my life, have driven me into this situation. I now pay the ⁶ Clodius had, in consideration of a large sum of money, contrived to get the son of Tigranes out of Pompeius's custody, though not without a struggle, in which some lives were lost. This was likely to have caused a division among the triumvirs, Clodius being supported by Cæsar. But it seems to have passed over.

penalty of my error; though your letters encourage me,—from which I easily perceive the amount of your own hopes. These indeed afforded me consolation, till you came to that part,—“after Pompeius, now gain over Hortensius, and people of that description.” I beseech you, my Pompeius, do you not yet see by whose means, by whose treachery, by whose baseness, I am ruined? But of this we will talk when we meet. I only say, what I imagine you know, that it is not my enemies, but my enviers, who have undone me. Now, if indeed things are as you hope, I will support myself, and use my best endeavours, with that hope which you bid me entertain. But if, as it appears to me, things are fixed and settled, what I was not permitted to do in the best manner must be done in one less becoming*. Terentia often acknowledges her obligations to you. One of my troubles in apprehension is the business of my poor brother. When I know how this will be determined, I shall know what I ought to do. The expectation of letters, and of those advantages which you hold out, keeps me, as you advise, at Thessalonica. If any news arrives, I shall know what is hereafter to be done. If, as you mention, you left Rome on the first of June, we shall very soon meet. I send you the letter which I wrote to Pompeius. Dated the 13th of June, at Thessalonica.

LETTER X.

WHAT has taken place, up to the 25th of May, I have learned from your letters; the rest I waited to hear at Thessalonica, as you advised. When this account arrives, I shall more easily be able to determine where I shall be; for if there is occasion, if anything is done, if I see any hope, I will either remain where I am, or will go to your house in Epirus. But if, as you say, these prospects should have vanished, I must make some other arrangement. Hitherto you show me nothing besides the disagreement of those people*,—which, however, relates to everything rather than to me. I do not see, therefore, how this can help me: still as long as you encourage me to hope, I will obey you: for when you charge me so often and so severely, and upbraid me with want of courage, I beseech you, what evil is there which does not enter into my calamity? who ever fell at once from such a lofty state? in so good a cause? with such force of talents, and wisdom, and favour? such support from all honest men? Can I forget what I was? Can I help feeling what I am? what honour I have lost? what glory? what children? what fortunes? what a brother? whom (to teach you a new species of calamity) though I loved him, and have always loved him, more than myself, yet I avoided seeing, that I might neither be witness to his grief and mourning, nor present myself to him in ruin and

* Alluding to his death. Suicide was not then held to be either a crime or a disgrace. Cato and Atticus adopted it in perfect conformity with the principles of their respective sects. affliction, whom he had left in the height of prosperity. I omit other grievous considerations,—for I am prevented by tears. And ought I then to be reproached for my sadness? or rather for having committed so great a fault as not to retain these advantages (which might easily have been done, if plots for my destruction had not been laid within my own walls), or at least not to lose them but with my life? I have mentioned this, that you might rather relieve me, as you do, than that you should think me deserving of reproach and blame. And I write the less to you, because I am interrupted by my sorrows; and in truth I have more to expect from thence than to say myself. If any intelligence is brought me, I will acquaint you with my determination. I wish you to write to me, as you have hitherto done, about everything, that I may not remain in ignorance on any point. Dated the 18th of June, at Thessalonica.

LETTER XI.

YOUR letters and some favourable reports, though not on the best authority, and the hope of hearing further from you, and your advice, have all kept me at Thessalonica. When I shall have received the letters I expect, if there is indeed that hope which has been encouraged by rumours, I will go to your house; if it is otherwise, I will take care to inform you what I do. Continue to assist me as you do with your exertions, your advice, and influence. Have done with consolation, and cease to upbraid me. When you do so, I seem to have lost your affection, and to have lost your sympathy; whom I conceive to be so affected with my misfortunes, that you are yourself inconsolable. Support my excellent and kind brother Quintus. I beg you to write to me fully everything that may be depended upon. Dated the 28th of June.

LETTER XII.

You argue seriously about what may be hoped, especially through the senate; and at the same time you add, that the clause of the law (for my banishment) is stuck up¹, by which nothing is allowed to be said, and accordingly nothing is said. In this state of things do you blame me for being afflicted? while I am, as you yourself know, in such affliction as nobody ever felt. You hold out hopes from the new elections; but what hope is there with the same tribune of the people², and a hostile consul elect³? I am much hurt about the speech⁴ which has been brought forward. Try if possible to heal this wound. I wrote it long since in anger, because he had first attacked me; but I had so suppressed it, that I never imagined it would get abroad. How it should have got out I do not know; but as it never happened that I had ly dispute with him in person; and as it seems to me to be written more carelessly than my other speeches, it may possibly be concluded not to be mine. I should wish, if you think I can by any means be re-established, that you would do what I can in this business; but if I must needs be alone, I am less solicitous about it. I continue still in the same place, without any power of converse, or thinking. Though, as you mention, I had expressed a wish that you might come to me at Dodon²; I understand that where you are³, you are of all use to me, and that here you could not relieve me by one word of comfort. I am unable to write more; nor indeed have I anything to say. I expect rather to hear from you. Dated the 17th of July, at Thessalonica.

LETTER XIII.

(Græc. xiv.)

FROM your letters I am full of expectation about Pompeius, what he may intend, or declare concerning me; for I imagine the comitia are over: for which you mention that he wished to have my use considered. If my hopes make me appear foolish to you, I entertain them by your desire, though I am aware that your letters have rather been calculated to check me and my expectations. I should be glad now to hear distinctly what you think. I know that I have fallen into this trouble by the many faults I have committed. If any chance should in any degree rectify them, I shall be less regret that I have lived, and continue to live. On account of the constant communication of this road, and my daily expectation of news, I have not yet moved from Thessalonica; but I am now driven away, not by Plancius⁴, (for he would rather keep me,) but by the nature of the place itself, which is ill calculated to bear the pain of such calamities. I did not go into Epirus, as I had reasoned, because lately all accounts and letters agreed that there was no occasion for my being near Italy. Therefore, as soon as I hear the result of the elections, I shall go into Asia, though I am not yet certain to what place; but you shall hear. Dated the 21st of July, at Thessalonica.

LETTER XIV.

(Græc. xiii.)

AFTER seeing my hopes diminish, and at length vanish, I changed my intention, which I had mentioned to you, of going into Epirus; nor have I moved from Thessalonica, where I determined to remain till I should hear something from you about that you mentioned in your last letter; that something would be proposed in the senate on my behalf as soon as the comitia were over; and that Pompeius had told you so. Wherefore, since the comitia are passed, and you say nothing, I thence consider it the same as if you had written to tell me that nothing was done: nor shall I regret having been led by the hope of so near a termination⁵. But as to the commotion which you said you foresaw, and which seemed likely to turn to my advantage, they who have lately arrived, say there will be none. My remaining hope is in the tribunes elect. If I wait for this, you will have no reason to think me inattentive to my interest, and to the wishes of my friends. When you blame me for bearing my misfortunes so heavily, you ought to excuse me, seeing that I am afflicted as you never saw, or heard any one to be. For as to what you say you hear of my grief having turned my head, my head is sound enough. I wish it had been so in the time of my danger, when I was so unkindly and cruelly treated by those whom I supposed to have been my friends: who, when they saw me begin to waver in my resolution, urged me on in such a manner as to use all their wickedness and perfidiousness to my destruction. Now, since I am going to Cyzicum, where I shall have fewer opportunities of receiving letters, I hope you will be the more particular in letting me hear everything which you think I ought to know. Continue to love my brother Quintus. If in my own wretchedness I leave him safe, I shall not esteem myself wholly ruined. Dated the 5th of August.

LETTER XV.

ON the 13th of August I received four letters from you: one, in which you reproach me with want of firmness; another, in which you mention that a freedman of Crassus had told you of my anxiety and emaciation; the third, in which you inform me what has been done in the senate; the fourth, about what you say Varro had confirmed to you respecting the disposition of Pompeius. To the first I reply, that my grief is so far from affecting my understanding, that it is an additional source of grief to have no opportunity, no person with whom I may employ that understanding which is unimpaired. For if you cannot without uneasiness lose me alone, what do you suppose I must feel, who lose you and everybody? And if you, who are living in security, yet want me, how do you suppose I must want that very security itself? I do not care to enumerate all that has been taken from me; not only because you are already acquainted with it, but also that I may not aggravate my affliction. This I affirm, that nobody was ever bereft of such great advantages, or ever fell into such miseries. Moreover, time does not only not mitigate this distress, but even augments it. Other troubles are softened by age; this cannot fail daily to increase, both from the sense of actual misery, and from the recollection of my past life: for I want not merely my goods, and my friends, but myself. For what am I? But I will not be the occasion either of distressing your mind with lamentations, or of handling, oftener than is necessary, my own wounds. For as to exculpating those whom I mentioned to have injured me, and among the rest, Cato; I am so far from imagining him to be implicated in that crime, that it is a great source of trouble to me that the pretences of others should have had more weight with me than his honesty. The others whom you exculpate, ought to stand excused by me, if they are so by you. But about these things we trouble ourselves too late. As for Crassus's freedman, I imagine he is not sincere in anything he has said. You describe the business to have been well managed in the senate. But what says Curio? Has he not read that ^b speech which has been brought forward I know not from whence? Axius, however, giving me an account of the transactions of the same day, does not so much commend Curio. But he may have omitted something: you have assuredly said nothing beyond the fact. The conversation of Varro affords some hope of Caesar. I wish Varro may himself engage in my cause; which I am persuaded he will do, both of his own accord and from your solicitation. Should fortune ever restore me to the possession of you and my country, I shall certainly endeavour to give you, of all my friends, the greatest cause to rejoice at it; and shall so fulfil the demands of duty and affection, (which have before, I confess, been too little manifested,) that you shall think me restored to you, no less than to my brother and my children. If I have in anything behaved ill towards you, or rather since I have done so, pray pardon me; for I have behaved much worse towards myself. I do not write this because I am not fully aware of the part you bear in my great affliction; but, in truth, if the regard you have and have had for me, had been deserved on my part, you never would have suffered me to remain in want of that prudence in which you abound; nor would you have suffered me to be persuaded that it was to my advantage to have the law concerning the companies ^c carried through. But you administered to my grief nothing but tears, the effect of your love; as I did myself. Whatever might have been effected, had I possessed claims upon you to consider day and night what I ought to do; that has been omitted, not through your fault, but mine. But if not merely you, but anybody, when I took alarm at the ungenerous reply of Pompeius ^d, had called me back from that disgraceful counsel ^e, which you of all people was most able to do, I should either have fallen with honour, or should now live victorious. You must forgive me what I say; for I accuse myself much the most: next I accuse you as another self, and at the same time an associate in my fault. If I am restored, I shall think myself even less to blame; and shall certainly possess your affection through your own kindness, since it will be independent of any received from me.

Concerning the conversation which you mention to have had with Culeo on the invalidity of a private law ^f; there may be something in it; but it is much better to have it abrogated. For if nobody prevents it, what can be more secure? Or if anybody should not allow it to be carried, the same decree of the senate will still operate to invalidate it. Nor is there need of anything else besides the abrogation; for the former of Clodius's two laws did not affect me ^g. And if at the time of its promulgation, I had either thought fit to approve it, or, as it deserved, to disregard it, it could have done me no harm. Here first my judgment failed, or rather injured me. I was blind, I say; blind in changing my habit, and supplicating the people; which, unless I should have been attacked by name, was prejudicial to me. But I am going back to things that are past. It is however with this view, that if anything is done in this business, you may not meddle with that law which contains many popular enactments. But it is foolish in me to prescribe what you should do, or how. I only wish something may be done; on which subject your letter is rather reserved, lest, I suppose, I should feel my disappointment too severely. For what do you see possible to be done? or by what means? By the senate? But you have told me yourself that Clodius had fixed upon the door-post of the senate-house that clause in the law which makes it illegal to reconsider it, or to speak of it. How then is it that Domitius has said he would move for its reconsideration? or how is it that Clodius should have been silent, while some, as you mention, were speaking of that affair, and demanding its reconsideration? But if anything is to be done by the people, can they act without the concurrence of all the tribunes of the people? What of my goods? what of my house? Can that be restored? or if not, how am I myself restored? Unless you see some means of solving these difficulties, what is the hope to which you call me? And if there is no hope, what is life itself? I shall therefore wait at Thessalonica for an account of the transactions of the 1st of August, from which I may determine whether I shall take refuge in your grounds, (that I may both avoid seeing people whom I do not like, and may, as you say, see you, and be nearer at hand in case anything is done,) and this I understand you and my brother Quintus to advise, or whether I shall go to Cysicum. Now then, my Pomponius, since you have exerted no portion of your prudence for my safety; either because you supposed that I was sufficiently capable of judging for myself; or that you owed me nothing more than merely to be ready on my behalf; and since I have been betrayed, prevailed upon, seduced to neglect all my supports; have disappointed and deserted all Italy, ready to rise in my defence; have given up myself, my friends, into the power of my enemies; while you looked on in silence, who if your judgment was not better than mine, at least had less to fear, raise up, if you can, my afflicted friends, and in this yet assist me. But if all means are obstructed, let me be informed even of that; and cease at length either to chide me, or civilly to offer me consolation. If I meant to accuse your want of faithfulness, I should not trust myself in preference to your roof. No, I accuse my own folly, in supposing that your love for me was equal to my wishes. Had this been the case, you would have shown the same fidelity, but greater care; and certainly would have held me back when I was hastening to my ruin; nor would you have encountered those troubles which you now sustain in my shipwreck. Take care then to let me know everything clearly and distinctly; and help me, as you do, to be again somebody, since I can no longer be what I was, and what I might have been.

appears to have applied this general principle to Cicero's particular case.

And believe that it is not you, but myself, that I accuse in this letter. If there are any, to whom you think letters should be sent in my name, I should be glad if you would write, and take care to have them delivered. Dated the 19th of August.

LETTER XVI.

ALL my motions are rendered uncertain from nothing else but the expectation of your letter of the 1st of August. If it affords any hope, I shall go into Epirus; if not, to Cyzicum, or some other place. The oftener I read over your letters, the more my hopes decline; for the reading them weakens the hope they were meant to excite: so that it is very evident you are actuated by a regard both to my consolation and to truth. I, therefore, beg you distinctly to tell me what you know, as it really is; what you think, as you really think. Dated the 21st of August.

LETTER XVII.

THE accounts I had received about my brother Quintus had been unfavourable, and without variation, from the 4th of June to the 31st of August. On that day Livineius, the freed-man of Regulus, came to me from his master: he reported that no mention of my brother's administration had been made; but that there had been some talk about the son of Caius Clodius^a. He also brought me a letter from my brother. The next day Sestius' servant arrived with your letter, not so free from apprehension as the verbal communication of Livineius. In truth, I am very anxious in the midst of my own great distress, and the more so, because the question will come before Appius. The other matters which you mention in the same letter, relating to my hopes, seem to be less flattering than what I hear from other people. But, since the time is not far distant when the business must be determined, I shall either go to your house^b, or shall still remain in this neighbourhood. My brother tells me that you alone are the support of all his concerns. Why, then, should I exhort you to do what you do already? or why should I return my thanks, which you do not desire? I only wish that fortune may enable us again to enjoy our mutual affection in security. I am always particularly anxious for your letters. You need be under no apprehension that your minuteness can be troublesome to me, or your candour disagreeable. Dated the 4th of September.

LETTER XVIII.

You had raised in me no little expectation, when you mentioned that Varro had told you in confidence, that Pompeius would certainly undertake my cause; and that as soon as he should have heard from Caesar, which he was expecting, he would get somebody to propose it. Was there nothing in this? or has Caesar's letter proved unfavourable? Is there anything to be hoped? You mentioned also that he had said something would be done at the time of the comitia. Let me, if you see in what straits I am, and if you think it becomes your kindness, let me be informed of the whole matter. For my brother Quintus, an excellent man, who is so much attached to me, sends accounts full of hope, fearing, I suppose, my want of courage. But your letters are various; for you would not have me to despair, nor too hastily to hope. I entreat you to let me know everything that you are able to discover.

^a P. Clodius had two brothers, Caius and Appius. The former had died, leaving two sons; the latter is the same who is afterwards spoken of in this letter.

LETTER XIX.

As long as I continued to receive from you such accounts as gave me reason to expect anything further, I was detained at Thessalonica by hope and anxiety: but when all the business of this year seemed to be finished, I did not care to go into Asia, both because company is disagreeable to me, and if anything should be done by the new magistrates, I should be sorry to be out of the way. I have, therefore, determined to go to your place in Epirus; not that the nature of the place was of any consequence to me, who altogether shun the light; but I should go with peculiar pleasure from your port to my restoration; or, if that is cut off, I can nowhere more easily support this wretched life, or what is far better, throw it up. I shall have only a few people with me, and shall dismiss the great body of them. Your letters have never raised my hopes so much as those of some other friends; yet have my hopes always been less even than your letters. Nevertheless, since a beginning has been made, however it has been done, or from whatever cause, I will not disappoint the sad and mournful requests of my excellent and only brother, nor the promises of Sestius^a and others, nor the hope of that afflicted woman Terentia, nor the entreaties of the poor dear Tullia, and those of your faithful letters. Epirus will afford me either a passage to restoration, or what I have mentioned above^b. I beg and beseech you, my Pomponius, as you see me spoiled of all my splendid, cherished, and enjoyable possessions, by the perfidy of certain people; as you see me betrayed and cast forth by my counsellors; and know that I am compelled to ruin myself, and all that belong to me; that you will assist me with your compassion, and support my brother Quintus, who may yet be saved; that you will protect Terentia and my children; that you will wait for me, if you think there is any chance of seeing me there^c; otherwise, that you will come to visit me, if possible, and will assign me so much of your land as my body can occupy^d; and that you will send me servants with letters as soon as possible, and as often as you can. Dated the 16th of September.

* LETTER XX.

CICERO salutes Q. Cæcilius, the son of Quintus, Pomponianus Atticus*. That this should be so, and that your uncle should have discharged this duty to you, I exceedingly approve: I would say that I rejoiced at it, if I could use this word. Alas! how would everything be according to my mind, had it not been for want of courage, of prudence, of honesty, in those whom I trusted: which I care not to recollect, lest I add to my regret. But I am sure you must remember the life I led; how many delights it contained, how much dignity. To recover this, I beseech you by your fortunes†, strive as you do; and enable me to spend the birth-day of my return with you and with my relations in your delicious house. I wished to have stayed at your place in Epirus for this hope and expectation, which is held out to me; but the letters I receive make me think it more convenient to remain where I am. Respecting my house, and Curio's speech, it is as you say. The general restoration, if only that be granted, will contain everything. But there is nothing about which I am more anxious than my house. However, I mention nothing to you in particular; I commend myself wholly to your affection and fidelity. It is very gratifying to me, that in so great an inheritance‡ you should have been able to extricate yourself from all trouble. When you promise your services on my behalf, that on every occasion I may derive assistance from you, rather than from anybody else, I am very sensible how great a support this is; and I know that you undertake, and are able to sustain, many kind offices for my preservation; and that you need not be entreated to do so. When you forbid me to suspect that I had either done or neglected to do anything towards you, which could give you offence; I will comply with your request, and free myself from that source of uneasiness: nevertheless, I am indebted to you so much the more, in proportion to the excess of your kindness towards me, over mine towards you. I beg you to tell me what you see, what you hear, what is done; and to exhort all your friends to assist me. The proposed law of Sestius is deficient both in dignity and caution: for it ought expressly to name me, and to mention more particularly my effects; and I should be glad if you would attend to this circumstance. Dated the 4th of October, at Thessalonica.

* LETTER XXI.

THE day on which I write this, is the thirtieth since I have received any letter from you. It had been my intention, as I before mentioned to you, to go into Epirus, and there wait for whatever might happen. I beg you, if you see anything either way, that you will distinctly inform me; and that you will write in my name, as you propose, any letters which you may think necessary. Dated the 28th of October.

* Atticus having been adopted by his uncle Q. Cæcilius, and made his heir, is addressed by this new designation conformable to the custom of his country.

LETTER XXII.

THOUGH my brother Quintus and Piso had acquainted me with the state of affairs; yet I wished that your engagements had not prevented you from writing, as usual, about what was doing, and what conclusions you drew from it. The hospitality of Plancius has hitherto retained me, when I have several times attempted to go into Epirus. He has entertained the hope, which I cannot say I have, that we might be able to go away together; which he expects may do him honour. But now that soldiers are said to be coming, it will be necessary for me to leave him. When I go, I will immediately write to inform you where I am. Lentulus by his kindness towards me, which his actions, his promises, and his letters declare, affords some hope of the good disposition of Pompeius. For you have often told me in your letters, that he was entirely under Pompeius's influence. My brother has written to me about Metellus, how much he hoped had been effected through you. My dear Pomponius, exert yourself that I may again be permitted to live with you and with my friends; and write to me everything. I am oppressed not only with grief, but with the want of all that was dearer to me than myself. Farewell!

As I knew if I went through Thessaly into Epirus I should be a long while without intelligence, and as I have friends at Dyrrachium, I have come to them, after writing the former part of my letter at Thessalonica. When I set out again for your place, I will let you know; and I trust you will send me an exact account of everything, of whatever kind it may be. I now look for the thing itself, or lose all hope. Dated the 26th of November, at Dyrrachium.

LETTER XXIII.

ON the 27th of November I received three letters from you; one dated the 25th of October, in which you encourage me to wait with firmness for the month of January*, and say everything that can lead to hope; such as the zeal of Lentulus, the good-will of Metellus, and the whole design of Pompeius. In another letter, contrary to your custom, you do not mention the date: though you sufficiently mark the time by saying that you write on the same day on which the law was promulgated by the eight tribunes†; that is, the 29th of October; and you add what advantage you conceive that promulgation to have produced. From which, if my restoration is become desperate by the fate of this law, I should hope, for your love of me, you will esteem this fruitless diligence of mine rather unhappy than absurd; but if there be indeed any hope, that you will use your endeavour to make the new magistrates hereafter exert themselves with greater diligence in my support. For that proposed law of the old tribunes omprised three heads; one for my return, which was incautiously drawn up; for by it nothing is restored besides my citizenship and my rank; which, considering my condition, is a great deal; at what ought to have been secured, and in what manner, cannot have escaped you*. The next head is copied from the ordinary form of indemnity, to make anything should be enacted in support of this law, which was contrary to other existing laws. As for the third head, observe, my Pomponius, with what design, and by whom, it was inserted. Do you know that Clodius added such sanctions to his law as should put it almost, or altogether, out of the power either of the senate, or of the people, to invalidate it. But you know also that the sanctions of laws which are abrogated, are never regarded. Were it otherwise, scarcely any could be abrogated; for there is none which is not needed round by some obstacle to its repeal. But when a law is repealed, that very clause is repealed, which was meant for its security. Notwithstanding this is so, and has always been so held and observed, our eight tribunes have inserted this clause: "If there be anything contained in this law, which by any laws or decrees, that is, which by the Clodian law, it is not, and shall not be, strictly lawful to promulgate, abrogate, diminish, or supersede; or which subjects to a penalty, or to any other punishment, whatsoever hath promulgated, abrogated, diminished, or superseded it; nothing of such kind is enacted by this law." And this could not affect those tribunes; for they were not bound by the enactment of their own body: which affords the greater suspicion of some malice, that they should have inserted what was immaterial to themselves, but prejudicial to me; that the new tribunes of the people, if they were at all timid, might think it still more necessary to use the same clause. Nor has that been overlooked by Clodius: for he said in the assembly on the 3rd of November, that under this head was prescribed to the tribunes what was the extent of their authority. But you are aware that no law has any clause of this kind; which, if it were necessary, all would have, but go to abrogate a former law. I wish you could find out how this should have escaped Ninus and the other tribunes, and who introduced it; and how it happened that eight tribunes of the people should not have hesitated to bring my cause before the senate. Or can it be that they, who thought this clause might be disregarded, should at the same time be so cautious in abrogating it, as to be afraid of that, when they were free from the law, which need not be observed by those who were bound by the law? This clause I certainly should not wish the new tribunes to propose: but let them enact what they will; the clause which recalls me, provided the thing be accomplished, will satisfy me. I am already ashamed of having written so much about it: for, I fear, by the time you read it, the thing will be past hope, so that my concern may appear to you pitiful, to others ridiculous. But if there is anything to be hoped, look at the law which Visellius drew up for T. Clodius, which pleases me exceedingly: for I do not like that of our friend Sestius^a, which you say you approved. The third letter is dated on the 13th of November, in which you explain sensibly and accurately what it is that seems to delay my business; about Crassus, Pompeius, and the rest. I beg you, therefore, if there is any hope that it can be accomplished by the wishes, the authority, the collected numbers of honest men, that a general push may be made; attend to this, and excite others. But if, as I too plainly see, both by your suspicions and my own, that there is really no hope; I pray and beseech you to love my brother Quintus, whom I have wretchedly ruined; and not to suffer him to adopt any measures which may be inexpedient for your sister's son. As for my poor Cicero, to whom I leave nothing but ill-will and disgrace, protect him as well as you can^b, and support by your kind attention Terentia, of all women the most afflicted. I shall go into Epirus as soon as I have received the intelligence of the first day's proceedings. I hope you will inform me in your next letter how the beginning passed off. Dated the 30th of November.

LETTER XXIV.

WHEN you mentioned to me before, that the provinces of the consuls had been appointed with your approbation^a; though I was afraid how this might turn out, yet I hoped your better judgment might have seen some reason for it. But since I have heard, both by word of mouth and by letter, that this proposal of yours is very much blamed, I have been deeply concerned; inasmuch as that little hope, which remained, seems to be taken away. For if the tribunes of the people are offended, what hope can there be? And they may with reason be offended, when they, who had undertaken my cause, have been left out of consideration, and by our concession have lost the exercise of their just rights: especially when they declare that they wished for my sake to have the power of making out the appointments of the consuls; not that they might throw any impediment in the way, but that they might attach them to my cause: but that now, if the consuls are ill disposed towards me, they may show it without constraint; or if they should be inclined to support me, still they can do nothing without the concurrence of the tribunes. For as to what you say, that unless my friends had consented, they would have attained the same purpose through the people^b: this could not be done against the sense of the tribunes^c: so that I fear we may have lost the good-will of the tribunes; or, if that still remains, that the bond of union with the consuls may have been lost. Another not small disadvantage attached to this is, that the

* See letter 20 of this book.

^a This seems to have been said under the idea of destroying himself.

^b Atticus had no other concern in it than as being one of Cicero's principal friends and agents at Rome. It seems that the appointment of the provinces was a check upon the conduct of the consuls, which was exercised in great measure by the tribunes. By having the appointment previous to their entering upon their office, the tribunes lost this control, and the consuls became independent.

^c This had been done in the case of Cæsar.

^d Any one of the tribunes might interpose to stop the progress of a law in the popular assembly.

* Alluding to his house and property.

^a There is confessedly some error in the text. I propose to read "Sive sitne qui." The alteration of "qui" for "quod," is very little, and seems to me to make the sense of the whole passage clear and consistent.

solemn resolution, as it was represented to me, that the senate would pass no act before my cause was determined, has been broken; and that, on an occasion which was not only unnecessary, but quite unusual and novel. For I do not believe that the provinces were ever before appointed for the consuls elect. Hence that firmness, which was shown in my behalf, having been once infringed, there is nothing now which may not be decreed. It is not surprising that this should have pleased those friends to whom it was referred: for it would be difficult to find anybody who would openly give an opinion in opposition to such advantages of the two consuls. It was impossible not to favour either so friendly a man as Lentulus, or Metellus, who so kindly laid aside his resentment. But yet I fear whether we may be able to keep these, and may not have lost the tribunes of the people. How this has turned out, and what is the state of the whole business, I wish you to inform me; and with your usual frankness. For the truth itself, though it may not be agreeable, is yet acceptable to me. Dated the 10th of December.

LETTER XXV.

SUBSEQUENT to your departure^c, I have received letters from Rome, by which I perceive that I must pine away in this sad condition. For (you will pardon me) if any hope of my re-establishment had remained, such is your affection, that you would not have gone away at this time. But that I may not seem ungrateful, or willing that everything should be sacrificed along with me^d, I say no

^c From Rome. It is generally agreed by commentators that the words "a me" ought to be omitted. If they are retained, I should still understand it to mean "since you left my affairs at Rome." For the tenor of these letters forbids the supposition of Atticus's having been with Cicero.

^d It is probable that Atticus might have written to say that some business called him away from Rome at this time; to which Cicero replies, that he would not be more upon the subject. This I beg of you, that you will endeavour, as you promised, wherever I may be, to stop your progress before the first of January.

LETTER XXVI.

I HAVE received a letter from my brother Quintus with the decree of the senate concerning me. It is my intention to wait for the passing of the law^e; and if there is any malignant opposition, I will avail myself of the authority of the senate, and will rather lose my life, than my country. Pray make haste to come to me.

LETTER XXVII.

I SEE by your letters, and by the case itself, that I am utterly lost. I beg that in any concerns in which my family may stand in need of your assistance, you will have compassion upon my wretchedness. I hope, as you say, that I shall shortly see you.

[The law for Cicero's recall was for some time obstructed by the tribune Serranus, who had been gained over by Clodius. At length, however, it passed on the 4th of August, Cicero having already embarked for Italy, and arrived at Brundisium, where, three days afterwards, he received intelligence of the law having been ratified with great zeal and unanimity by all the centuries.]

thought to wish that Atticus should sacrifice everything for his sake.

^e The decrees of the senate had not the force of a law till they were confirmed by the people. But the law of Cicero's banishment having been carried by illegal means, the senate had on this occasion passed a vote, "that if, through any violence, or obstruction, the law for his recall was not suffered to pass, within the five next legal days of assembly, Cicero should be at liberty to return, without any further authority."—Life of Cicero, p. 100.

BOOK IV.

LETTER I.

AS soon as I came to Rome, and met with anybody to whom I could properly entrust a letter to you, I thought nothing deserved my earlier attention, than sending to congratulate with you upon my return. For I had found, to tell you the truth, that in giving me advice, you were as much in want of fortitude and prudence, as myself^f; and considering my former attachment to you, that you had not been over diligent in protecting my safety. Yet you, who had at first partaken of my error, or rather madness, and had been the companion of my false alarm, bare our separation with much uneasiness, and spared no pains, no exertion, diligence, or trouble, to bring about my restoration. And I may truly affirm, that amidst the greatest joy, and most wished-for congratulations, the only thing wanting to complete my satisfaction, is to see, or rather to embrace you; whom once possessed, I hope never again to leave. If I do not make amends also for all the neglected fruits of your kindness^g in the time that is gone by, I shall verily think myself undeserving of this return of fortune.

^f The explanation of this and the following sentences is found in letter 15, book III.

I have already obtained, what I conceived most difficult to be recovered in my situation, that distinction in the forum, that authority in the senate, and favour among good men, in a greater degree than I could have hoped. But in regard to my property, which, as you know, has been violated, dissipated, and plundered, I am in great difficulty; and I stand in need, not so much of your money, which I look upon as my own, but of your advice, in gathering up and securing the remains of it.

^g This likewise derives explanation from book III., letter 15, where Cicero declares that his future attentions to Atticus shall make up for any past deficiencies.

Now, though I imagine that everything has been either related to you by your friends, or brought by messengers and common report; yet I will shortly describe what I think you will most wish to be informed of by my own letters. I left Dyrrachium the 4th of August, on the very day when the law passed for my recall. On the 5th I came to Brundisium, where my dear Tullia was ready to receive me on her birth-day, which happened also to be the anniversary of the foundation of the Brundisian colony, and of the temple of Public Safety in your neighbourhood. This was noticed by the populace, and celebrated with great rejoicing. On the 8th of August, while I was at Brundisium, I heard from my brother Quintus, that the law had been confirmed in the assembly of centuries^b, with an astonishing zeal among all ranks and ages, and an incredible concurrence of all Italy. Thence, having been honoured by the principal people of Brundisium, as I pursued my journey I was met by messengers of congratulation from all parts. On approaching the city there was nobody of any order of citizens known to my nomenclator^c, who did not come to meet me, excepting those enemies, who could not either dissemble, or deny their hostility. When I arrived at the Capenan gate^d, the steps of the temples were filled with the lower classes of people, who signified their congratulations with the loudest applause; and a similar throng and applause attended me quite to the capitol: and in the forum, and in the capitol itself, the numbers were prodigious. The day following, which was the 5th of September, I returned thanks to the senate. These two days the price of provisions being very high, the people collected tumultuously, by the instigation of Clodius, first at the theatre, then at the senate, crying out that I had occasioned the dearth of corn. At the same time, the senate having met upon the subject of the supplies, and Pompeius being called upon by the voice, not only of the populace, but of the better sort, to provide for it, and being himself desirous of it, and the people calling upon me by name to propose a decree for that purpose, I did so, and explained fully my sentiments, in the absence of others of consular rank, who said they could not with safety declare their opinions, excepting Messala and Afranius. A decree of the senate was accordingly passed agreeably to my proposal, that Pompeius should be engaged to undertake the business, and that a law should be brought in. Upon the recital of this decree, when the populace, according to this silly and new custom, had given their applause, repeating my name, I harangued the assembly by the permission of all the magistrates present, excepting one prætor and two tribunes of the people. The next day there was a full senate, and all the consular senators granted whatever Pompeius asked for. Upon his demanding fifteen lieutenants, he named me at the head of them, and said that I should be in everything another self. The consuls drew up a law, giving to Pompeius the power of regulating the corn all over the world for five years. Messius drew up another, giving him an unlimited command of money, superadding a fleet and army, and a greater authority in the provinces, than was possessed by the governors themselves. That consular law of mine now appears quite modest; this of Messius intolerable. Pompeius says he prefers the former; his friends are for the latter. The consular senators, headed by Favonius, exclaimed against it; I say nothing; more especially because the pontifices have yet given no opinion respecting my house^e. If they remove the religious impediments, I shall have a noble area, and, agreeably to the resolution of the senate, the consuls will estimate the value of the buildings: if it is otherwise, they will pull down what is now there, will contract for a house in their own names, and will make an estimate of the whole amount. Such is the situation of my affairs; hazardous for a state of prosperity; for a state of adversity, good. In my income, as you know, I am much embarrassed; and have besides some domestic troubles, which I do not care to commit to writing. I have all that affection, which I ought to have, towards my brother Quintus, endowed as he is with distinguished loyalty, virtue, and fidelity. I am looking for you, and beg you to hasten your coming; and to come in such a disposition of mind, as not to suffer me to remain in want of your counsel. I am entering upon the beginning of another life. Already some, who defended me in my absence, begin to be secretly angry with me upon my return, and openly to envy me. I greatly want you.

LETTER II.

If it happens that you hear from me less frequently than from some others, I beg you will not attribute it to my neglect, nor even to my occupations; which, great as they are, yet can never interrupt the course of my affection and duty. But since I came to Rome, it is now only the second time that I have known of any body to whom I could entrust a letter; consequently this is the second I have sent. In the former I described to you the manner of my return, and what was my situation, and the condition of all my affairs, hazardous for a state of prosperity, for a state of adversity good enough. After the date of that letter, there followed a great contest about my house. I spake before the pontifices the last day of September. The cause was diligently debated by me, so that if ever I made a figure in speaking, or if ever else, then at least the sense of my injuries, and the importance of the issue, added new force to my language. I could not, therefore, withhold the speech from our young friends; and, though you do not ask for it, yet I shall shortly send it to you. The sentence of the pontifices was to this effect—"If he who said he had made a dedication

^b Clodius, when he destroyed Cicero's house in Rome, consecrated part of the area on which it stood, and erected a temple there to the goddess Liberty. The remaining part Clodius had planted, and appropriated to his own use. Hence it is that Cicero goes on to say, if the consecration of the area be set aside, he shall have a noble space for a new house; or if it should not be set aside, that the consuls were at least to clear the ground, and contract for the building of a house for him on the unconsecrated part.

^b The most dignified assembly of the people was that in which the votes were collected by centuries, or classes.

^c An attendant, whose duty it was to mention the names of everybody that passed. Such people were particularly employed by persons engaged in a public canvass.

had not been specially appointed to that purpose by any order of the people, either in their centuries or tribes; then that part of the area appeared capable of being restored to me without any religious impediment." Upon this I was immediately congratulated; for nobody doubted but the house was adjudged to me. But presently that fellow¹ mounts the rostra, by permission of Appius², and tells the people that the pontifices had given sentence in his favour, but that I was attempting to get possession by force; and he exhorts them to support him and Appius, and to defend their own liberties. Upon this, while even among that lowest rabble some wondered, some smiled at the fellow's madness, I had determined not to come forward till the consuls, by the decree of the senate, should first have contracted for the rebuilding of Catulus's portico³. On the first of October was held a full senate, at which all those pontifices, who were senators, were present. Marcellinus, who was much attached to me, being first called upon to speak, inquired of them what they had intended by their sentence. Upon which M. Lucullus, in the name of all his colleagues, replied, that the pontifices were the judges of religion, the senate of the law: that he and his colleagues had given their opinion upon the point of religion; that they would speak of the law in the senate. Each of them then being asked his opinion in turn, argued at length in my favour. When it came to Clodius to speak, he wished to wear out the day⁴; nor was there any end to it, till after having spoken for nearly three hours, he was at length compelled, by the disapprobation and clamour of the senate, to bring his discourse to a conclusion. A decree of the senate being then made agreeably to the proposal of Marcellinus, with only one dissentient voice, Serranus interceded⁵. Immediately both consuls referred it to the senate to take this intercession into consideration; and the most dignified opinions were pronounced, that it was the pleasure of the senate that my house should be restored to me; that Catulus's portico should be rebuilt; that the resolution of the senate⁶ should be supported by all the magistrates; that if any violence was offered, the senate would consider it to have been done by his means who had interposed his negative. Serranus took fright, and Cornicinus had recourse to his old farce; and having cast off his upper garment, he threw himself at the feet of his son-in-law⁷. He asked to have the night to consider of it, which they were not disposed to grant, for they had not forgotten the first of January⁸. With some difficulty, however, this was acceded to by my consent. The next day the decree of the senate was made, which I sent you. Then the consuls contracted for the restoring of Catulus's portico. What Clodius had done was immediately demolished by the contractors, with universal approbation. The consuls, by the opinion of their council⁹, valued what had been erected upon the ground at 2000 sestertia (16,000*l.*)¹⁰; the other things very illiberally. My Tusculanum at 500 sestertia (4000*l.*) The Formianum at 250 sestertia (2000*l.*). This valuation was very much censured, not only by all the best people, but even by the common sort. You will naturally ask, then, what was the cause of it. They say it was my modesty, in neither objecting, nor strenuously urging my claims. But that is not the case, for this might indeed have been of advantage to me; but these same people, my Titus Pomponius, I say these very people, whom you know well enough, who have clipped my wings, are unwilling to let them grow again; but I hope they are already growing. Do you only come to me, which I am afraid of your not doing till late, owing to the arrival of your and my friend Varro. Having put you in possession of what has been done, let me inform you of my further designs. I have engaged myself to Pompeius in such a manner, as in no degree to be prevented from being at liberty, if I should wish it, either to offer myself for the censorship, should the next consuls hold the comitia for that purpose, or to take a votive legation¹¹ of almost all the shrines and groves; for so my affairs required¹². And I wished to have it in my power either to canvass, or at the beginning of the summer to go from Rome: and in the mean time I thought it desirable to keep in the sight of the citizens who had shown me such great kindness. These are my views with regard to the public, but my domestic concerns are greatly embroiled. The building of my house at Rome is going on. You know with what expense, and what trouble, I am restoring my Formianum, which I am neither able to relinquish, nor to see. My Tusculanum I have advertised for sale. I cannot easily do without a villa near the city. The kindness of my friends has been exhausted in that business, which has produced nothing but disgrace; which you felt at a distance, I in fact¹³. By their favour and assistance I should easily have obtained everything, if my own defenders had permitted it. But I have now great trouble from this source. The other things which vex me are of a more secret nature¹⁴. I enjoy the affection of my brother and of my daughter. I am expecting you.

² Appius was at this time prætor.

³ This adjoined to the area of Cicero's house, and had partly been destroyed to make way for Clodius's temple of Liberty.

⁴ This was sometimes practised for the purpose of impeding the progress of any decree of the senate.

⁵ Any one of the tribunes of the people had the power of stopping the decrees of the senate, which was called interceding.

⁶ The acts of the senate, when they were not suffered to pass on to a decree, were called auctoritates.

⁷ Cornicinus was father-in-law to Serranus.

LETTER III.

I know you will be glad to be informed of what is doing here, and in what concerns me, to hear it from myself; not that such matters, which are done in the face of the world, can be more certain from my pen, than from anybody else who may write to you, or tell you about them; but that you may perceive from my style how I am affected by them, and what is the present feeling of my mind, and condition of my life. On the third of November, the workmen were violently driven from my ground by armed men; the portico of Catulus, which was rebuilding by contract entered into by the consuls, agreeably to the decree of the senate, and which had already reached the roof, was thrown down. My brother Quintus's house was first injured by stones thrown from my area, then set on fire by order of Clodius, in sight of the whole city, with lighted materials, to the great grief and lamentation, I say not of all good people, for I know not if there are any, but fairly of all people. He rushed on impetuously; and, after this outrage, seemed to think of nothing but the slaughter of his enemies; went round from street to street, and openly invited the slaves to revolt^a. Before, when he avoided^a a trial, he had indeed a difficult case, and strong evidence against him; but yet he had a case, he might deny the fact, he might lay it upon others, he might even defend some of the charges as warranted by law. After this ruin, fire, plunder, he is deserted by his friends, and scarcely retains Decimus the marshal, or Gellius: he uses the counsel of slaves; he sees that if he should kill all whom he wished, his cause upon trial could not be worse than it is already. Therefore as I was going down the Sacred Street on the 3d of November, he pursued me with his mob; shouts, stones, sticks, swords, all unforeseen. I retreated into the vestibule of Tertius Damion; they who were with me easily prevented these rioters from entering. He might himself have been killed. But I begin to use^b dieting; I am tired of manual operations. When he saw that he was driven by the general voice not to trial, but to punishment, he afterwards imitated all the Catilines and Acidini. For on the 12th of November he was so determined to destroy and burn Milo's house on Mount Germalus, that openly at eleven o'clock in the morning he brought men with shields and drawn swords, and others with lighted torches. He had taken possession of the house of P. Sulla as his camp, to conduct the siege. At that time Q. Flaccus brought out from Milo's Annian house^c some determined men, killed the most notorious of the Clodian mob, and wished to kill him, but he took refuge in the inner part of the building. On the 14th Sulla came to the senate, Clodius staid at home, Marcellinus was admirable, everybody was exasperated. Metellus wasted the time of speaking by cavilling, in which he was assisted by Oppius^d, and even by your friend^e, of whose firmness and excellence your letters have spoken so truly^f. Sestius was outrageous; Clodius, if his election^g were not suffered to take place, threatened the city. Upon the proposal of Marcellinus's motion, which he delivered from a written paper, so as to include the whole of my case, the arena, the burning, my personal danger, and made them all to precede the comitia^h; one declaredⁱ that he would observe the heavens^j on all the comitia days. Then followed factious speeches from Metellus, rash ones from Appius, furious ones from Publius. This, however, is the sum; unless Milo had declared his observation of the heavens in the Campus Martius, the comitia would have taken place. On the 20th of November Milo came into the Campus Martius in the middle of the night with a great attendance. Clodius, though he had a chosen band of runaway slaves, dared not come into the field. Milo remained till noon with great honour, and to the great joy of the people. The struggle of the three brothers^k was disgraceful, their strength broken, their fury contemptible. Metellus challenges a prohibition in the forum the next day; that there was no occasion to come into the Campus Martius by night; that he should be in the forum at seven ^d Manutius has not without reason conjectured that it ought to be written Appius, who was Clodius's brother, and was prætor, and was in the senate.

^e It is generally supposed that Cicerio here means Hortensius.

^f This is said ironically, Cicerio having had some reason to suspect that Hortensius acted towards him ungenerously.

^g He was at this time candidate for the office of ædile. His election would prevent all judicial proceedings against him till the expiration of his year.

^h The comitia for the election of ædiles.

ⁱ Proscript. It has been doubted what was the nominative to this verb. I believe it to be used indefinitely, and without a nominative. That this is sometimes done by ancient authors, has been observed by Bentley on the construction of the word "Inquit," Hor. l. 1. 78. Bishop Pearce has extended this observation to some other words in his note upon 1 Cor. vi. 16. Many other examples of the same kind might be produced both in sacred and profane writings. Of the former I would instance the word ἀποκαλύπτεται, 1 Cor. xiii. 13, which has given some trouble to commentators, and among the rest to Pearce himself. I apprehend it to be used absolutely or indefinitely, and without any nominative—"It is revealed," or "revelation is made." It is used in the same manner again, c. xiv. 30. So 2 Cor. xiii. 16, ἡπικα δ' ἂν διασπάρῃ—"whenever any one turn." 1 Cor. xiv. 5 and 13, διαμυστρεύ—"one interpret," or "it be interpreted." So Luke xvi. 9, δέξωμαι ὅπως—"that you may be received." Among profane authors we find the same construction, as ἐπιδέχεται, Arr. Epict. l. 32, "Does any one admit?" τὸν ὁβόν ἐπιφέρειν προσδοκῶν κακοῦ, Aristot. Eth. iii. 6, "People define." And in Latin, Ordinis hæc virtus erit et venus, aut ego fallor, or I am nunc dicat, &c.—"that one should say." Hor. Ars Poet. 42. So again, v. 232, Trimetria accrevere jussit non Iambe—"it was ordained." And similar to these is "putant," Cic. Nat. Deor. ii. 16—"it is supposed."

^j The magistrates only were allowed to observe the heavens for the purpose of divination; and when they did so, no comitia could be held.

^k Clodius, Appius, and Metellus: the latter was not properly a brother, but a cousin. This use of the Latin word "frater" has before been taken notice of.

^a The servants of the ancient Romans were all slaves, of which they kept a prodigious number.

^b On this occasion he had been accused by Milo for the violence committed while he was tribune. The consul Metellus contrived to prevent the prosecution.

^c Perhaps it ought to be written "Dieta curare incipio." As it stands, the sense is, that "I begin to have my affairs protected by gentle methods." In the other case it would mean, that "I begin to treat Clodius by gentle methods."

^d Many of the opulent citizens had more than one house at Rome; frequently by adoption or bequest.

in the morning. Therefore, on the 21st Milo came before sun-rise into the forum. Metellus at the first dawn was hastening secretly to the Campus Martius through by-ways; Milo comes up to him between the groves¹; forbids the comitia: he withdrew under the severe and opprobrious scoffs of Q. Flaccus. The 22d was market day². On that day, and the day following, there was no meeting. It is on the 24th that I am writing, at three o'clock in the morning: Milo is already in possession of the Campus Martius. Marcellus the candidate³ is snoring, so that I, who am his neighbour, might hear him. Clodius's vestibule, I am told, is deserted, there being but a few ragged fellows, without even a lantern. Their party complained that it was all my doing, little knowing the spirit and the ability of that hero⁴. His courage is admirable. I send you rare news. But this is the sum of the whole: I do not think the comitia will be held, and I do think that Publius, if he is not first killed, will be brought to trial by Milo. If he come in his way, I foresee that he will be killed by Milo; he does not hesitate to do it; he openly professes it; my fate⁵ does not intimidate him, for he has had no envious and faithless counsellor, nor does he mean to trust to any inactive great man. My mind alone is in full vigour, even more so than when I was in power; in my property I am wasted; yet I contrive to repay the liberality of my brother Quintus against his will, from the resources of my friends rather than my own, lest I should be quite exhausted. In your absence I am at a loss what measures to take respecting the general state of my affairs; therefore hasten up.

LETTER IV.

On the 30th of January, before it was light, Cincius made himself most agreeable to me by informing me that you were in Italy, and that he was going to send a servant to you, whom I would not suffer to go without a letter from me; not that I have anything particular to tell you, especially being now so near; but that I might assure you that your arrival is most grateful to me, and what I have been most anxiously expecting. Therefore, fly up, in order to gratify your own affection, and to feel the effects of mine. We will settle other matters when we meet. I write this in haste. As soon as you arrive, come with your attendants to my house; I shall be delighted to receive you. You will find a noble arrangement of Tyrannio for the library of my books, the remains of which are much better than I had supposed. I should be glad also if you would send me two of your library clerks, whom Tyrannio may employ in repairing my books, and other offices, and that you would direct them to bring some parchment to make indexes, which I think you Greeks call syllabuses. But this according to your convenience. But do you at all events come, if you can stay in this part of the country⁶, and can bring Pilia⁷, for this is reasonable, and Tullia wishes it. In good truth you have bought a splendid situation. I understand your gladiators fight admirably. If you had chosen to contract for them, you might have saved yourself these two charges⁸. But of these things hereafter. Only mind to come; and, if you have any regard for me, remember about the librarians.

² The nundinæ, which were held every ninth day, and were holidays, when the comitia could not be held.

LETTER V.

WHAT say you? Do you suppose that I should wish my compositions to be read and approved by anybody, rather than by you? Why then have I sent them first to anybody else? I was pressed by him⁹ to whom I sent them, and had no other copy. What? Besides (for I have some time been nibbling at what must be swallowed at last) a recantation of my sentiments seemed to be rather disreputable. But farewell to upright, and true, and honourable counsels! It is not to be believed what perfidy there is in those chiefs¹⁰, as they wish to be; and as they would be, if they had any honesty. I have understood and known them, having been invited, deserted, cast off by them; yet it had been my intention to co-operate with them in the republic. They are the same that they were: I have at length by your instruction grown wiser. You will say that you advised, and persuaded me what to do; but not to write also. But I chose to lay myself under an obligation to maintain this new connexion; and to prevent my relapsing to those, who, when they ought to pity, do not cease to envy me. However I have, as I wrote you word, been very temperate in my subject. I shall become more exuberant, if both he receives it kindly, and these people show their vexation; who ill endure that I should possess a villa which had belonged to Catulus, and do not consider that I bought it of Vettius¹¹; who say that it did not become me to build a house; that I ought rather to sell one. But what more? If in the public expression of my sentiments I have spoken anything which they might approve; yet their joy is, that I should have spoken contrary to the wish of Pompeius. But there is now an end of this; and since those, who have no power, do not choose to behave kindly to me, let me try to be kindly received by those who have. You will say, "I wished it long ago." I know that you wished it; and that I was a very ⁶ At Antium.

⁷ Pilia was betrothed to Atticus, but not yet married; unless we suppose with M. Mongault that this letter should be divided into two, the first written from Rome, the other from Antium, after Atticus's marriage.

⁹ This seems to have been Cæsar, to whom Cicero had sent a complimentary poem.

¹¹ There were several of this name, all of them people of obscurity, and thereby forming a contrast to the family of Catulus.

ess. But it is now time that I should have regard to myself, since I can by no means have the regard of these people. I am much obliged to you for your frequent visits to my house. Crassipes^w runs away with my means. You may come from the direct road into the grounds; this seems more convenient. You will return home the next day, for what does it signify to you? But I will see about it^x. Your people have highly decorated my library by their arrangement and coverings. I should be glad if you would commend them for it.

LETTER VI.

RESPECTING Lentulus, I bear it as I ought. We have lost a good, and a great man, and one who tempered a noble spirit with much kindness. It is some consolation, though a poor one, that I by no means lament his fate like Scaevius, and the rest of your sect^y. For he so loved his country, that indeed I may consider him to have been snatched from its ruin by some favour of the gods. For what can be more disgraceful than our life? mine especially? As for you, though you have all the endowments of a statesman, you have addicted yourself to no party, but feel a common interest in all; while I, if I speak of the republic as I ought, am thought mad; if, as I am obliged to do, a slave; if I say nothing, oppressed and fettered. How much cause then have I for grief? which is also aggravated by this circumstance, that I cannot even express it for fear of appearing ungrateful. What if I should retire, and shelter myself in some port of rest? It is in vain. Rather let me rush into war, and take the field. Shall I then submit to be a follower, who have refused to be a leader? So it must be; for so I see it pleases you, whom I wish I had always minded. What remains is (according to the proverb) "Sparta is your lot, make the best of it." In good truth I cannot; and I approve the conduct of Philoxenus, who chose rather to be conducted back to prison^z. But I study in this place to discard these sentiments^a; and you, when we meet, shall confirm my purpose. I perceive that you sent me several letters, which I received all at the same time; and this even added to my sorrow; for by accident I first read three, in which it was stated that Lentulus was rather better; then came this thunderstroke in the fourth.

^w Tullia becoming a widow by the death of her husband L. Piso, was lately married to Crassipes, to whom Cicero had to pay her dower.

^x These expressions are attended with that obscurity which must always be found in familiar letters, from their relation to circumstances that are unknown to the reader. It seems to me most probable that they may refer to some letter of Atticus's inviting Cicero to come to him at Rome. For that Atticus was at Rome, appears from his frequent visits to Cicero's house while it was rebuilding; and that Cicero was himself at Antium, may be concluded from the mention of his library, which is known to have been at his villa near that place.

^y Of the sect of the Epicureans, who placed all their happiness in present enjoyment. See book i. letter 8, note ^a.

^z Rather than commend the verses of Dionysius the Tyrant.

^a The sense of this passage appears to me to have been misapprehended, by not adverting to the force of the word ista, which I conceive to mean "such sentiments as he had hitherto held."

But, as I said, it is not he that is to be pitied; but we, who are slaves. Respecting the Hortensiana^b, which you advise me to write; I am engaged in other subjects, yet am not unmindful of your injunction. But in truth at the very outset I relinquished it, that I might not appear foolishly to have been offended with the unkindness of a friend; then again foolishly to proclaim it by writing. I was at the same time apprehensive lest the depth of my abasement, which has appeared in my actions, might become still more conspicuous if I should write anything; and that offering satisfaction might seem to partake of levity, but I will consider of it. Do you only let me hear something from you as often as possible. Desire Luccius to show you the letter which I have just sent him, in which I ask him to write the account of my transactions; I hope you will be pleased with it^c. Encourage him to set about the work; and thank him for having agreed to undertake it. Look after my house^d as far as you can. Say something proper to Vespertorius, who is very liberal towards me.

LETTER VII.

NOTHING could be more seasonable than your letter, which relieved my mind from great uneasiness, on account of our dear boy Quintus^e. Charippus had come hither two hours before, and had quite frightened me. As to what you say of Apollonius; what evil spirit has possessed him, a fellow from Greece, to suppose he might throw his affairs into disorder, like the Roman knights: for Terentius might plead his right^f. With respect to Metellus, peace to the dead; but, however, for many years there has not died a citizen, who —. I will be answerable for your money. For what need you fear, whomsoever he has made his heir? unless it is Publius. But he has not done improperly, although he was himself —. Therefore, on his account, you will not have occasion to open your coffers. In what concerns the others^g, you must be more cautious. You will have the goodness to attend to my requests about my house^h; you will set a guard; you will warn Milo. The people of Arpinum are clamorous on the subject of Lateriumⁱ? What say you? I for my part am sorry. But (as ^b The Hortensiana seems to have been some work either to be dedicated to Hortensius, or complimentary and conciliatory towards him.

^e The son of Q. Cicero, the same whom he afterwards calls the young Cicero.

^f Terentius was a Roman knight. It is probable that Atticus may have had some money dealings with him, and with Apollonius, and that they were both defalcators.

^g These breaks are evidently indicative of some reproachful expressions, of which Cicero checked the utterance out of respect to the dead.

^h This refers to Apollonius and Terentius.

ⁱ Cicero had likewise in a former letter begged his friend to look after it. Indeed it seems to have been necessary, not only for the sake of encouraging and directing the workmen, but also to protect it from the violence of Clodius. See letter 3 of this book.

^j Laterium was a possession of Q. Cicero in the neighbourhood of Arpinum. By some alterations he seems to have given offence to the people there.

Homer sings) "he disregards their words." It only remains to beg that you will continue to nurse and to love the young Cicero, as you do.

LETTER VIII.

MANY passages in your letter delighted me, and nothing more than your "dish of potted cheese". As to what you say about my debts being reduced "to a shrod," I reply by the proverb, "call nobody great before you see his end".¹ I find nothing for you ready built in the country; there is something in the town²; but it is uncertain whether it is to be sold. This is close to my house. Be assured that Antium is the Buthrotum³ of Rome, as that of yours is of Coreyra. Nothing can be quieter, nothing more retired, nothing pleasanter. "However despicable, our home is still dear". But since Tyrannio has arranged my books, a new spirit seems to animate my house; and in accomplishing this, Dionysius and your Menophilus have been of wonderful assistance. Nothing can be more elegant than your shelves, now that the books are so highly distinguished by their covers. I should be glad to hear from you of the success of the gladiators⁴; but it is on the presumption that they conducted themselves well; if otherwise, I do not ask about them⁵.

Apenas was scarcely gone, when your letter arrived. What say you? Do you think he will not propose⁶ the law? Speak louder, I beseech you; for I seem scarcely to have heard it. But let me know presently, if it is not troublesome to you. As a day has been added to the holidays, I can the better spend that day here with Dionysius. I am quite of your mind about Trebonius. With respect to Domitius⁷, "no fig, I swear, was ever so like another," as his situation is to mine; either because it happens through the same people, or because it is beyond all expectation, or because there are no honest men left. In one respect it is unlike; that he deserves it. But with respect to the misfortune itself, I do not know if mine were not the lesser; for what can be worse than this, that he who has been all his life looked upon as consul elect⁸, should at last be unable to obtain the

³ The town of Antium, from whence Cicero writes.

⁵ The original is obscure, and probably mutilated.

⁶ See letter 4 of this book.

⁸ It is uncertain to what law this alludes.

consulate? especially when he stood alone, or at most had only one competitor. But if it be, which I do not pretend to know, that he has in the memorandums of his calendar as long a list of consuls to come, as of those already made, what can be more wretched than he? unless it be the republic, in which there is no hope even of any amendment. The first intelligence I had of Natta was from your letter. I dislike the man. You ask about my poem. What if it should endeavour to make its escape¹¹? Would you consent? With regard to Fabius Luscius, which I had been going to mention, he was always very friendly to me, nor had I ever borne him any ill will; for he was a sensible, modest, well behaved man. As I did not happen to see him, I supposed he had been absent; till I heard from this Gavius of Firmum, that he was in Rome, and had been there all along. Can such a trifling cause, you will say, have offended him? He had given me much information about the Firmian brothers. What may be the reason of his anger against me, if he is angry, I am quite ignorant. Respecting the advice you give me, to conduct myself like a good politician, and keep my own counsel; I shall do so. But I stand in need of greater prudence; for which I shall apply to you, as I use to do. I wish, if you have any access to Fabius, that you would smell out, and just taste that guest of yours¹²; and send me daily accounts of these, and all other matters. When you have nothing to tell me, tell me even that. Farewell.

LETTER IX.

(Grav. x.)

It is strongly reported at Puteoli that Ptolemæus is restored to his kingdom¹³. If you have any certain information, I should be glad to know it. I am here feeding on Faustus's library. You might suppose perhaps that it was on the exquisite productions of Puteoli and Lucrinum. There is no want of these; but, to say the truth, in the present state of the republic, I have lost my relish for other enjoyments and pleasures; and find support and refreshment from books alone; and would rather occupy that little seat of yours under the statue of Aristotle¹⁴, than the curule chair of these people; and rather walk with you at your house, than with him¹⁵, with whom I see I must walk. But about this walk chance must determine, unless there be some god who has a regard to us. With respect to my gallery, and my stove, and all that Cyrus¹⁶ is engaged to do, I should be glad if, as far as you can, you would look after them; and press Philotimus to despatch; that I may have it in my power to make you some return in this kind¹⁷. Pompeius came to Cumanum the 23rd of Pompeius and Crassus, at the instigation of Caesar, whom he had foolishly provoked.

¹² Supposed to mean Saufeius.

¹³ Ptolemæus was restored by Gabinus, who was governor of Syria, but was not authorised to re-establish Ptolemæus in Egypt.

¹⁴ In Atticus's library.

¹⁵ Pompeius.

¹⁶ An architect. See book ii. letter 3.

¹⁷ By receiving Atticus in his library, as he had been received in that of Atticus.

April. He immediately sent a message of compliment to me. It is the following morning that I write this, and am going to him.

LETTER X.

(Græc. ix.)

I SHOULD be glad to know if the tribunes really prevent the census by vitiating the days for holding it; ^a such is the report here; likewise what they are doing, or what is their design generally respecting the censurate. I have been here with Pompeius. He talked a good deal about the republic; and was dissatisfied with himself, "as he said." For so we must speak of this man. He despised the province of Syria, and extolled that of Spain. Here again we must subjoin—"as he said." And I imagine, whenever we speak of him, we should add this; as Phocylides does in the beginning of his poems—"This also is by Phocylides." He expressed his thanks to you for having undertaken to place the statues ^c for him; and towards me he showed particular kindness. He also came to me at Cumanum from his own villa. He appeared to me to desire nothing less than that Messala should stand for the consulship. If you know anything about it, I should wish to be informed. I am much obliged to you for saying that you will commend my fame to Luccæus ^d, and that you frequently visit my house. My brother Quintus writes me word, that having now his dear Cicero with him, he should go to you the 7th of May. I left Cumanum the 27th of April: and the same day I was at Naples with Lætus. The 28th of April, early in the morning, I have written this, setting off to Pompeianum.

LETTER XI.

I AM delighted with your letters, two of which I received together on the last day of the month. Go on to tell me the rest. I am anxious to know the whole business. Find out too, if you can, how this is: you may do it through Demetrius. Pompeius said that he expected Crassus in Albanum on the 28th, and that as soon as he arrived, they should go immediately to Rome, to examine the accounts of the public renters. I asked if they would do it during the exhibition of the gladiators? He replied, before they came on. How this is, if you either know at present, or else when he is come to Rome, I wish you would send me word. Here I am devouring books with a wonderful man, (so in truth I esteem him,) Dionysius, who sends his compliments to you, and all your family. "Nothing is more delicious than universal information." Therefore, as to a man of curiosity, write to me distinctly what takes place the first day, what the second, what the censors do, what Appius, what that popular Apuleia ^e. Lastly

^a We have before seen instances of this practice of the magistrates, who observed the heavens in order to prevent the public business.

^c These statues were for the ornament of the theatre which Pompeius was now erecting.

^d By encouraging him to write the history of Cicero's consulship. See book iv. letter 6.

^e By this term Cicero is supposed to mean Clodius

I wish you to inform me what you are doing yourself. For, to say the truth, I am not so much delighted with the news, as with your letters. I have brought nobody with me besides Dionysius: yet I am not afraid of being without your conversation. I am charmed with the work ^f. You will give my book to Luccæus. I send you that of Demetrius Magnes, that you may have a person ready to bring me back a letter from you.

LETTER XII.

EGNATIUS ^g is at Rome. But I spoke to him strongly upon Halimetus's business at Antium, and he promised to exert his influence with Aquilius. You will be able to see him therefore if you wish it. I scarcely think I can offer my assistance to Macro; for on the 15th I see there is to be an auction at Larinum, which will last three days. I hope, therefore, though you interest yourself so much about him, that you will excuse me. But, as you love me, come with Pilia to dine ^h at my house the 2d of next month: in short you must do it. On the 1st I mean to dine in the gardens of Crassipes, by way of an inn. I shall elude the order of the senate ⁱ and shall get home after dinner, that I may be ready the next morning for Milo. I shall there see you, and remind you of your engagement. All my family join in kind regards.

LETTER XIII.

I SEE that you are apprised of my having come to Tusculanum the 15th of November; there I met Dionysius. We wish to be at Rome the 15th of next month. What do I say? we wish? nay, but we must be there. Milo's marriage is to be celebrated; and there is some expectation of the comitia being held ^j. If this is confirmed, I am not sorry to have been absent during the alterations, which I understand have taken place in the senate ^k. For I must either have supported what I could not approve; or must have been wanting in attention, where I ought not. But I hope you will describe to me, as distinctly as possible, these matters, and the present state of the republic, and how the consuls ^l bear this rude treatment.

Apuleius was the name of a seditious tribune in Marius's time, who had driven into banishment Metellus Numidicus. The feminine termination is added in contempt, to mark his effeminacy and degeneracy.

^f This probably alludes to something contained in Atticus's letters, and which must necessarily remain obscure.

^g A banker. See book vii. letter 18.

^h The Latin cæna, which is usually translated supper, nearly corresponds to our dinner: it was commonly served about three or four o'clock in the afternoon. The prædium of the Romans resembled our luncheon.

ⁱ This order required every senator in Rome to attend at the meetings of the senate.

^j The comitia for the election of the next year's consuls, which had been factiously interrupted.

^k These alterations probably relate to the proposal of confirming the governments of Gaul, Spain, and Syria, to Cæsar, Pompeius, and Crassus, for five years.

^l Domitius Enobarbus and Appius Claudius Pulcher were elected almost at the end of the year, the election having been prevented from taking place at the ordinary time.

I am quite thirsty for news : and if you ask me, I must say that I have sad misgivings. They say that our Crassus went out in his military dress not quite with the same dignity as his coeval formerly L. Paullus, then a second time consul. O the wicked man^m ! I have finished the oratorical books with care : they have occupied much of my time and attention : you may get them transcribed. I have also to beg this of you, that you will make me an accurate representation of the present state of things, that I may not come thither quite a stranger.

LETTER XIV.

Our friend Vestorius has informed me by letter, that he believes you left Rome on the 10th of May, later than he had mentioned, because you had not been quite well. I shall be very glad to hear that you are better. I wish you would write home to your people to let me have access to your books, in the same manner as if you were there. Amongst others, I particularly want Varro's worksⁿ. For I must take some things from thence for the books which I have in hand, and which I hope you will approve. I should be glad, if you have any news, especially from my brother Quintus^o, next from C. Cæsar, and if you can tell me anything of the comitia, or the republic, (for you commonly soon smell out these matters,) that you would let me know. If you have nothing to tell me, yet let me hear from you ; for your letters can never be unseasonable, or unwelcome. But, above all, I beg you to come back to us as soon as you have finished your business, and completed your journey^p to your mind. Make my compliments to Dionysius. Farewell.

LETTER XV.

(Crass. xvi.)

You may judge how busy I am, by receiving this letter^q in the hand-writing of a clerk. On the frequency of your letters I have nothing to accuse you : but most of them only let me know where you were, as coming from you ; or, besides, informed me that you were well. I was particularly glad to receive two letters of this kind almost at the same time, which you sent from Buthrotum ; for I was anxious to know that you had had a good passage. But this frequent correspondence rather pleased me by its quickness than by its copiousness. The letter which your guest M. Paccius delivered to me was indeed important, and full of matter. To this, therefore, I shall write in answer ; and, in the first place, must tell you that I have shown Paccius, by words and deeds, the weight of your recommendation : so that though he was before quite a stranger to me, I have received him into close familiarity. I shall now proceed to the other parts of your letter. Varro, about whom you write to me, shall be introduced in some place^r, if only a place can be found for him. But you are aware of the nature of my dialogues ; so that in those upon oratory, which you so highly commend, no mention could be made of anybody, who was not known, or heard of, by those who carry on the disputation. This, which I have begun on the subject of government, I have attributed to the persons of Africanus, and Philus, and Lælius, and Manilius : and have added the young men Q. Tubero, P. Rutilius, and Lælius's two sons-in-law Scaevola and Fannius. I thought, therefore, since I mean to prefix an introduction to each book, as Aristotle has done in those which he calls his public treatises, of making some occasion for naming him ; which I understand you approve. I only wish I may be able to accomplish my undertaking ; for I have embraced, as you perceive, a great and momentous subject, and one which demands much leisure, which I exceedingly want. When in those books which you commend, you miss the person of Scaevola, you must know that I have withdrawn it not inadvertently ; but have followed the example of our divine Plato in his Republic. There, when Socrates had come into the Piræus to Cephalus, a rich and pleasant old man, as long as the first dialogue was going on, the old man is present at the disputation ; then, having himself delivered his opinion, he says that he must go away upon some religious business ; and he does not afterwards return. I imagine Plato thought it hardly proper to detain a person of that age any longer in so protracted a discussion. Much more I thought it right to use the same discretion in regard to Scaevola, whose age and state of health you remember, as well as his honours ; which made it hardly becoming in him to remain for several days in Crassus's Tusculan villa. Besides, the subject of the first book was congenial with Scaevola's studies ; the others, as you know, contain technical reasonings, at which I did not choose to have that cheerful old man, such as you knew him, to be present. I shall pay attention to what you tell me concerning my daughter's settlement ; for by the testimony, as you say, of Aurelius, it is a good security : and by this also I shall recommend myself to my dear Tullia. I am not wanting to Vestorius : for I understand this to be your wish ; and I take care to let him know it. But are you aware of his disposition, that while we are both ready to serve him, nothing can be more untractable ? Now for what you ask about C. Cato. You know that he was acquitted on the Junian and Licinian law ; and I foretell that he will be acquitted on the Fufian ; and that, with even more satisfaction to his accusers than to his supporters. He has, however, returned into friendship with me and Milo. Drusus is prosecuted by Licinius, with leave to challenge the judges on the 3rd of July. The rumours about Procius are not favourable ; but you know how the judgments are given.

^r That is, I will endeavour to introduce his name into some part of my writings.

^m Crassus went out under the curse of the tribune Ateius.

ⁿ Varro had written several treatises on the history and antiquities of Rome, with which he was particularly conversant. Cicero was probably engaged in his work on Government.

^o Q. Cicero was lately made lieutenant to Cæsar in Gaul.

^p A journey into Asia, mentioned in the next letter.

^q Several of the latter letters of this fourth book, especially this, seem to have been written at different intervals, and to have been strangely misarranged. At this distance of time it would be fruitless to attempt to disentangle their contents.

Hirrus is reconciled with Domitius. The decree of the senate, which the consuls have proposed relating to the provinces, "Whoever hereafter," &c., never pleased me, because I knew that the declaration of Memmius must be very offensive to Cæsar. My friend Messala, and his competitor Domitius, have been very liberal towards the people. Nothing can exceed the favour in which they are held; they were sure of being consuls. But the senate has decreed, that previous to the comitia an inquiry should be made without publishing the result¹. These resolutions, which were generally applicable² to each candidate, gave the candidates great alarm. But some of the judges, amongst whom was Opimius Antius, called upon the tribunes to prevent any judgment without the sanction of the people. This succeeded. The comitia were put off by a decree of the senate, till the law for the reserved judgment should be passed: the day for the law arrived: Terentius interceded: the consuls, who had conducted the business with an easy hand, referred it to the senate. Here was Abdera itself³, not without some observations from me. You will say, "Cannot you be quiet?" Pardon me; it is hardly possible. For what could be so absurd? The senate had decreed that the comitia should not be held till the law had passed, and if anybody interceded, that the whole business should be taken again into consideration. It was first moved with indifference; intercession was made without any apparent unwillingness: the business was referred to the senate; upon which they passed a resolution, that it was desirable the comitia should be held at the very earliest time. Scaurus, who was acquitted during those few days of business, when I defended his cause with great eloquence, (for Scævola by his observation of the heavens had stopped the meetings of the people every day till the end of September, the day before I write this,) had given ample gratuities to the people by their tribes at his own house; but though his bounty was larger, that of the candidates who had been before him seemed to be more acceptable. I should like to see your countenance while you read this; for, to say the truth, you have some interest in having this traffic continue through several returns of the fair days⁴. But the senate was to be held to-day, that is, the 1st of October, for it is just beginning to dawn. There will nobody speak freely besides Antius and Favonius; for Cato is ill. About me you need not fear: yet I make no promises. What more do you inquire about? the judgments, I imagine, which have been passed. Drusus and Scaurus are found not guilty. It is thought the three candidates will be accused; Domitius by Memmius, Messala by Q. Pompeius Rufus, Scaurus by Triarius or by L. Cæsar. "What," you will ask, "will you be able to say for them?" May I die, if I know. In those three books, which you commend⁵, I find nothing. Now, to give you my opinion of affairs, we must bear them. Do you ask how I conducted myself? with firmness and freedom. "But he?" you will say, "how did he bear it?" Patiently; conceiving that he was bound to have some consideration for my dignity, till satisfaction should be made to me⁶. How, then, was he acquitted? Through the incredible weakness of his accusers, that is, of L. Lentulus the younger, whom everybody cries out upon as guilty of prevarication; then, through the extraordinary exertions of Pompeius, and the corruption of the judges. Yet, after all, thirty-two found him guilty, thirty-eight acquitted him. The other trials are still hanging over him: so that he is not fairly clear of his difficulties. You will say, "How, then, do you bear all this?" In truth, very well; and I am very well satisfied with myself for doing so. We have lost, my Pomponius, not only all the life and spirit, but the very complexion and ancient form of the state. There is no longer any republic, in which I can take pleasure, or acquiesce with any satisfaction. "Is this then," you will say, "what you bear so easily?" Even so: for I remember how flourishing the state was not long since, when I was at the head of affairs; and what return I have met with: so that I am troubled with no anxiety on that account. They, who were mortified at my having any share of power, are now outrageous that one man should possess all power. Many circumstances afford me comfort: yet I do not descend from my state; but return to that course of life which is most congenial to my nature, literature and study. The toil of pleading I relieve with the charms of oratory: my house and my country-seats afford me delight: I do not consider from whence I have fallen, but from whence I have risen. If I possess but my brother and you, the rest may go to ruin, for me. I may still philosophise with you. That part of my mind where passion once resided is grown callous: private and domestic concerns alone afford me pleasure. You will perceive a wonderful exemption from care, for which I principally depend upon your return: for there is nobody on earth whose sentiments are so congenial with my own. But hear something more: things tend to an interregnum⁷; and there is some surmise of a dictator⁸. Indeed there is much talk of it: which was of some use to Gabinus before timid judges⁹. The consular candidates are all charged with bribery. Gabinus, too, is added to the number;

* A factious engagement entered into between the consuls and the two candidates, Memmius and Domitius, for their mutual support. The decree of the senate alluded to must have been founded on this iniquitous contract, which Memmius, who was supported by Cæsar, declared afterwards in disgust to the senate. See letter 18 of this book.

¹ The sentence was not to be declared till after the election, yet so as to make void the election of those who should be found guilty.

³ Abdera was proverbially a land of folly and madness.

⁶ This probably alludes to the trial of Gabinus.

⁷ Pompeius, who was a friend to Gabinus.

⁸ Gabinus had conspired with Clodius in his attack upon Cicero.

¹¹ In the person of Pompeius.

whom P. Sylla accused, not doubting but that he was out of the city; while Torquatus opposed it without any effect. But they will all be acquitted; nor will anybody hereafter be condemned, unless he be guilty of murder. But all this is prosecuted with severity, so that the witnesses become eager. M. Fulvius Nobilior has been found guilty: many others, shrewd people do not even wait to answer to their accusation. What more news? yet there is some. Upon the acquittal of Gabinus, other judges, in indignation, an hour after, condemned by the Papian law one Antiochus Gabinus from among the assistants of the painter Sopolis, a freed-man, and serjeant of Gabinus. This man, therefore, charged by the Papian law with offence against the state, immediately said in Greek, "Have I not known thee, Mars, along with Paphias?" Pontinius wants to enter in triumph the 2nd of November. Cato and Servilius the prætors, and Q. Mucius the tribune, openly oppose it; for they say that no law has been passed for his command¹; and, in truth, it was passed in a foolish manner. But Pontinius will have the consul Appius with him. Cato, however, affirms that, as long as he lives, he shall not have a triumph. I imagine this, like many other things of the same kind, will come to nothing. Appius thinks of going into Cilicia at his own expense, without waiting for the law. I have replied to the letter I received by Paccius: let me inform you of the rest. I have learned from my brother's letters more than I could have believed respecting Cæsar's affection for me; and it is abundantly confirmed by Cæsar's own letters. The event of the Britanic war is anxiously expected; for it appears that the access to the island is defended by prodigious bulwarks; and it is now known there is not a grain of silver in the island, nor any hope of plunder, unless of slaves; of whom I imagine you do not expect to find any skilled in letters or in music. Paullus has now nearly built the court-house in the middle of the forum with the same ancient pillars; but that which he has begun is very magnificent. What say you? Nothing can be more acceptable, nothing more glorious, than that monument. Likewise the friends of Cæsar (myself I mean and Oppius, though you should burst with envy) towards that public work, which you used to praise to the skies, of enlarging the forum, and opening it quite to the Hall of Liberty, have disregarded the sum of 60,000 sestertia (500,000*l.*); as the claims of individuals could not be settled for less. We shall accomplish a most noble work. For in the Campus Martius we are going to make marble inclosures covered in for the comitia of the tribes; and we shall surround them with a lofty portico a mile in circuit. To this work will also be added a public hall. You will say, "What good will this do me?" What? should I conceal from you these Roman concerns? For when you ask what is doing at Rome, I cannot suppose you ask about the census, which is now past all hope; or about the judgments that may be given by the Coctian¹ law. Now suffer me to scold you, if I have reason on my side. For you say in the letter, which C. Decimus delivered to me, dated from Buthrotum, that you thought it would be necessary for you to go into Asia. To me, indeed, it seemed to signify nothing, whether you transacted your business by your agents or in person: since you so often go away, and stay away so long! But I would rather have considered this with you, while it was yet open to discussion; for then I might have done something: as it is, I shall check the reproof I was going to give you. I wish it may have any effect in hastening your return. I write to you less frequently, because I am uncertain where you are, or where you are likely to be. I have thought fit, however, to give this letter to one who, it was probable, would see you. Since you think that you shall go into Asia, I should be glad to know at what time I may expect you here, and what you have done about Eutyichides².

³ Before one entered Rome in triumph, it was necessary to pass a law permitting him to assume a military command for that day.

LETTER XVI.

(Græc. xv.)

I AM much pleased with what you have done about Eutyichides¹, who will have your old name of Titus with your new one of Cæcilius: as Dionysius's name is compounded of yours and mine into Marcus Pomponius. I shall be particularly glad if Eutyichides understands that this has been done out of your attention to my wishes; and that his kindness towards me in my distress was not lost upon me at the time, and has not been forgotten since. I conclude it was necessary to undertake your Asiatic journey. For without sufficient cause you never would have gone so far from your friends and all that you hold dear. But your kindness of heart and affection will best be shown by your speedy return. I have some fear however lest you should be detained by the urbanity of the rhetorician Clodius, and by Pituanus; who, they say, is a man of great learning, and now addicted to Greek literature. But, if you would be esteemed a man of probity, come back to us at the time you appointed. You shall be at liberty to enjoy the society of these persons at Rome, when they are safely arrived. You say that you are wishing to hear from me. I have written to you, and upon various subjects, all detailed in a journal³. But I suppose, as you do not seem to have remained long in Epirus, my letter never reached you. But the kind of letters I send you is such,

¹ It is not known what is meant by the Coctian law.

² I conceive Cicero to mean that Atticus so often absented himself, that it was of little moment to him whether he went in person to Asia, or whether he remained at Buthrotum.

³ See letter 16 of this book.

⁵ Probably alluding to the preceding letter.

that I do not care to entrust them to anybody, unless I can depend upon his delivering them to you. Now hear the state of affairs at Rome. On the 5th of July Sufenas and Cato^a were acquitted; Proci^lius was condemned. From hence we see that these mighty Areopagites^c consider the canvassing, the comitia, the interregnum, the dignity of the state, nay, the republic itself, to be of no account. We ought indeed to avoid killing a housekeeper in his own house^d, yet this is no great matter; for twenty-two acquitted, twenty-eight condemned. Publius^e indeed, eloquently summing up his accusation, had some effect upon the minds of the judges: Hortensius^f appeared in the cause like himself; I did not say a word, for my timid girl who is now unwell, was afraid that what I might say would offend Publius's spirit. This business being concluded, the Reatini^g brought me to their paradise to support their cause against the people of Interamna, before the consul and ten commissioners; because the water of the lake Velinus, which had been let out by Manius Curio, by cutting through the hill, flows down into the Nar, upon which depends the drainage, yet moderate moisture, of Rossea. I lived with Axius, who also took me to the place called the Seven Waters. I returned to Rome on Fonteius's account the 9th of July. I came into the theatre, and, first, was received with a great and general applause (but this is of no consequence, and it was silly in me to mention it); then, I gave my attention to Antiphon. He had received his freedom before he came upon the stage. Not to keep you in doubt, he bore away the palm. Nothing could be more insignificant than his figure, nothing more defective than his voice, nothing more just than his acting. This you must keep to yourself; yet in the Andromache he was greater than Astyanax himself^h. In the other parts he had nobody equal to him. You will ask now how I liked Arbuscula. I was very much pleased with her. The games were magnificent, and well received. The fighting with beasts was put off to another time. Follow me now into the Campus Martius. The canvass is carried on with great warmth: but, as Homer says, "I will give you a sign." Interest rose on the idesⁱ of July from four to eight per cent. You will say I am not sorry for that. O man! O

^a This means Caius Cato, who with Sufenas and Proci^lius had been guilty of great excesses, as tribunes of the people.

^b Said in derision of the judges, before whom the three above-named were tried.

^c Besides the charge of violence which attached to Cato and Sufenas, Proci^lius appears to have been accused of murder.

^d P. Clodius at this time attended to the business of pleading, and was a man of good ability.

^e In the original it is Hortalsus, which was another of Hortensius's names, by which he is also called elsewhere in these letters.

^f The inhabitants of Reate, about 40 miles N. E. from Rome, a place celebrated for its beauty.

^g I understand Cicero to mean that Antiphon played the part of Astyanax, in the play of Andromache; and though his figure and voice were both very deficient, yet he acted with more justness than Astyanax himself could have exhibited.

^h It was usual, in ancient Rome, to collect the interest of money on the ides, or near the middle, of every month. Cæcilius, to whose fortune and name Atticus had succeeded, obtained his wealth by this kind of usury; and by citizen! Memmius is supported by the whole weight of Cæsar's influence; with him the consuls have joined Domitius, under what conditions I dare not commit to a letter. Pompeius storms, and complains, and favours Scaurus; but whether he does this in appearance, or in earnest, is matter of doubt. There is no eminence in any of the candidates; money levels all distinction. Messala is drooping; not that his courage or his friends fail him, but the junction of the consuls and Pompeius are against him. I expect these comitia will be put off. The candidates for the tribunate have sworn to petition under the arbitration of Cato. They have deposited with them 500 sester^tia (4000*l.*), on condition that whoever should by Cato be found guilty of bribery, should lose that sum, which is to be divided amongst his competitors. I write this the day before the comitia are expected to take place. But if they do take place, and the messenger is not gone, I will give you the whole history of them on the 28th of July. If, as it is believed, the elections should be carried without expense, Cato alone will have been able to do more than all the judges. I have been defending Messius, who is recalled from his lieutenantcy; for Appius had sent him out a lieutenant to Cæsar. Servilius ordered him to be present. He has the support of the tribes Pomptina, Velina, and Mæcia. There is a sharp contest; but considerable progress is made. As soon as I am free from this, I am engaged for Drusus; then for Scaurus. Here are noble titles provided for my speeches. Perhaps I shall have also the consuls elect. If Scaurus is not one of them, he will have great difficulty in securing a favourable sentence. From my brother Quintus's letters I suspect he is now in Britain. I am in some anxiety to know what he is doing. One thing I have gained; that I have repeated and certain assurances of Cæsar's kindness and friendship. I should be glad if you would make my compliments to Dionysius, and ask and persuade him to come as soon as he can, to instruct my young Cicero and myself too.

LETTER XVII.

WITH what pleasure did I receive your letter, which I had been looking for! O happy arrival! O well-observed promise, and rare fidelity! O charming voyage! How greatly was I alarmed when I recollected the coracles^a of your former passage! But, if I am not mistaken, I shall see you sooner than you mention. For I imagine you thought that your ladies were in Apulia; which not being the case, why should Apulia detain you! for you must give up a few days to Vestorius, and taste again, after an interval, that Latin Atticism^b.

what follows, it is probable that Atticus continued the same practice.

^a Boats of wicker covered with leather, the Greek word of the text being probably equivalent to πλοία διφθέρινα, or δερμύτρια, described by Cæsar, B. C. I. 54; and such as are still used in some places. I suspect this, like many of the Greek terms in these letters, may have been used by Atticus himself. It is meant to indicate the smallness of the vessel in which he had crossed the sea.

^b Vestorius, it must be supposed, used the Latin language with an elegance which justified this expression; Atticism denoting the perfection of just composition.

But then you fly up hither, and visit this genuine example of my republic². I think I told you about the money openly distributed amongst the tribes from a certain place, previous to the comitia; also that Gabinius was acquitted: I take it for granted that he will be in authority. As to your inquiries about Messala, I do not know what to say. I never saw candidates so equal. With the strength of Messala you are well acquainted. Scaurus has been arraigned by Triarius. If you ask, I must say there is no great sympathy excited in his favour; yet his sedulity has rendered his memory not unacceptable,—and the recollection of his father has weight with the country voters. The other two plebeians³ are so matched, that Domitius is strongly supported by his friends, and derives some advantage from his public shows, which, however, were not very well received; Memmius is recommended by Cæsar's soldiers, and relies upon Pompeius's influence in the north of Italy. If he does not prevail with these helps, it is supposed that somebody will be found to put off the comitia till Cæsar's arrival; especially now that C. Cato has been acquitted⁴. On the 24th of October I received letters from my brother Quintus and from Cæsar, dated from the shores of Britannia, the latest on the 26th of September,—at which time the war was finished and hostages had been received; there was no plunder, but a sum of money was imposed. They were going to transport the army back from Britannia. Q. Pilius had already set out to join Cæsar. Now if you have any regard for me and your connexions, or if you have any faith or prudence, and think of enjoying your own comforts, you ought to make haste and come to us. In truth I cannot patiently bear to be without you. What wonder that I should long for you, when I so much long for Dionysius? whom both I and my Cicero shall beg from you when the time comes. The last letter⁵ I received from you was dated the 9th of August from Ephesus.

LETTER XVIII.

I suppose you think that I have forgot my custom and purpose, and that I write to you seldom than I used to do; but the truth is, that seeing the uncertainty of your actual situation and of your movements, I have not directed letters to Epirus, nor to Athens, nor to Asia, nor intrusted them to anybody that was not going to you. For my letters are of such a kind that if they should not be delivered it might occasion me a good deal

² Spoken ironically in comparing the corrupt state of Rome with the model proposed in his treatise on Government.

³ It was necessary to have one of the consuls of a plebeian family.

⁴ C. Cato had factiously prevented the elections on a former occasion.

⁵ This, if it is in its proper place, must mean the last letter previous to that which announced Atticus's arrival in Italy.

of trouble,—often containing secrets which I do not care to trust even to my own clerks. It is amusing to guess the issue: the consuls are in great disgrace, owing to C. Memmius the candidate having declared in the senate the contract which he and his competitor Domitius^b had made with the consuls,—that if through their influence they should get to be made consuls, they both bound themselves in the sum of 400,000 sesterii (3700*l.*) to produce three augurs, who would assert that they had been present at the passing of a law for giving military command to the consuls in the provinces they desired, though no such law had ever passed; and two consular senators who would say they had been present at the signing of the decree for the consular provinces, though in fact there had not been even any senate assembled. This contract, which was declared to have been made not verbally, but by names and entries in several tablets, was actually produced by Memmius, at the recommendation of Pompeius, with the names inserted. Hereupon Appius^c was unaltered: he lost nothing. The other consul^d was confounded, and, I may say, completely prostrate. But Memmius, having broken off the engagement against the wish of Calvinus, had entirely cooled again^e, and was the more inclined now to think of a dictator, and to favour the suspension of public business and the general licentiousness. Observe the evenness and freedom of my mind, and my contempt of the Seleucian province^f, and indeed my agreeable connexion with Cæsar; for this plank alone affords me pleasure in the general shipwreck. Ye gods! with what honour, dignity, and favour, does he treat me, and your, Quintus! I could do no more if I had the command myself. He tells me that Cæsar has kindly given him the choice of a winter legion^g. Should you not love this man? Who of those others deserve as well of us? But did I tell you that I was lieutenant to Pompeius, and that I was to be out of the city from the 13th of January? This appeared to me convenient for many reasons. But I shall say no more. The rest I must keep till we meet, that you may still look for some news. Remember me kindly to Dionysius, for whom I have not merely reserved, but have even built, an apartment. For to the supreme pleasure I take in your return, I derive a great accession from his arrival. The day you come to me I entreat you, by the love you bear me, to remain with your attendants at my house.

^b Cn. Domitius Calvinus, the same who is afterwards called Calvinus.

^d L. Domitius Ahenobarbus, the other consul.

^e Cæsar having shown his displeasure at the discomfiture made by Memmius, the latter ceased to prosecute the business further.

^f The province of Cilicia, which Appius coveted, and to which Cicero might expect to be appointed.

^g Where he would choose to have his winter quarters.

BOOK V.

LETTER I.

I PERCEIVED your feelings, and am very conscious of my own, at our separation; which should make you take the more pains to prevent any fresh scree for the prolongation of my government¹, but this our want of each other may not last beyond a year. About Annius Saturninus you have managed very judiciously. As for the securities, I request that, as long as you remain in Rome, you will provide them; and there are some securities required upon taking possession¹, among which are those on the Memmian and Atilian estates. About Oppius you have done as I wished; especially by speaking to him of the 800 sestertia (6660*l.*), which I should be glad to discharge even by borrowing (if necessary) for that purpose, without ruining for the final settlement of my accounts. I come now to that cross line at the end of your letter, in which you remind me about your sister. The state is this: when I came to Arpinum, as soon as my brother arrived, we first talked, and for some time, about you; from which I deviated to what I and you had said to each other in the fasculanum upon the subject of your sister. I never saw anything so gentle and placid as my mother was at that time towards her; so that if or any reason offence had been taken, it did not appear. So it passed that day. The day following we left Arpinum; and, it being a festival, Quintus was obliged to stop at Arcanum¹; I slept at Aquinum, but took some refreshment at Arcanum. You are acquainted with that estate. As soon as we got there, Quintus said in the kindest manner, "Pomponia, do you invite the ladies; I will send for the boys²." Nothing could be more gentle, as it seemed to me, not only in words, but also in his intention and countenance. But she, in my hearing, replied, "I am only a stranger here myself:" which, I imagine, alluded to Statius having gone before to prepare things for us. Then said Quintus to me, "See what I have to bear every day." You will say, "What was all this?" It is a great deal, and has given me much concern,—so absurdly and harshly did she answer in words and looks. I kept it to myself in sorrow. We all sat down, except her; to whom Quintus sent ¹ Cicero was appointed to the government of Cilicia, including a considerable part of Asia Minor. Those who had been consuls and prætors were usually rewarded with these governments, from which they drew enormous sums of money. Cicero always disliked the office, as foreign to his habits, and was anxious for the time when he might lay it down.

² It is always difficult to understand the money transactions of a foreign country; and it is not surprising that this difficulty should be much increased by the intervention of so many ages, in which the customs, as well as the records of particular cases, have been lost. The interpretation here offered, if it be not the exact sense of the original, is probably sufficiently near to it for all modern purposes.

¹ This was a place near Arpinum, where Quintus having an estate, thought it proper to assist at some local ceremonies.

² These ladies here mentioned were probably Cicero's wife and daughter, who might be coming to take leave of him; the boys were the sons of Cicero and of Quintus.

something from the table, which she rejected. In short, nothing could be milder than my brother, nothing ruder than your sister. I pass over many circumstances, which at the time were more offensive to me than to Quintus himself. Thence I proceeded to Aquinum. Quintus remained at Arcanum; but came to me at Aquinum the next morning, and told me that she had refused to sleep with him,—and that when she went away she continued just in the same humour in which I had seen her. In a word, you may tell her this, if you please, that I thought there was a great want of courtesy in her behaviour that day. I have written to you perhaps more at length than was necessary, that you might perceive there was occasion on your side, likewise, for advice and admonition. Further, I have only to beg that you will execute my commissions before you leave Rome; that you will send me word of all that happens; that you will drive out Pontinius¹; and that you will take care to let me know as soon as you go. Be assured nothing is dearer or sweeter to me than yourself. I took leave of A. Torquatus with great affection at Minturnæ: he is an excellent man. I wish you would tell him in the course of conversation, that I mentioned him in my letter to you.

LETTER II.

I WRITE this on the 10th of May, being on the point of leaving Pompeianum so as to sleep to-night with Pontius in Trebulanum. From thence I mean to proceed by regular journeys without any delay. While I was at Cumanum, Hortensius came to see me, which I took very kindly. Upon his asking if I had any commands, I gave him a general answer in other respects; but this I particularly requested, that, as far as lay in his power, he would not suffer my government to be prolonged. In which I should be glad if you would confirm him; and assure him that I was very much gratified by his visit, and by his promise of doing this or anything else I might want. In the same cause I have engaged my friend Furnius also, who I saw would be tribune of the people for the year. I had almost a little Rome in my Cuman villa, so great was the concourse in that neighbourhood: whilst my friend Rufio, seeing that he was watched by Vestorius, played a trick upon him; for he never called upon me. Indeed? when Hortensius came, both unwell, and so far; Hortensius too²; when a vast number besides; did not he come? No, I say. Did you not see him then? you will say. How could I help seeing him, when I passed through the town of Puteoli? where I bowed to him while he was engaged, I believe, in some business; afterwards I just bid him farewell, when he came on purpose³ from his villa to ask if I had any commands. Ought one to think him unkind? or ought one not rather to think him in that very circumstance deserving of commendation, that he should not have pressed to be heard? But to return. Do not imagine that I have any other consolation in this great plague than that I hope it will not last more than a year. Many, judging from the custom of others, do not believe me really to wish this; you, who know me, will use all diligence when the time comes for its being settled. When you return from Epirus I beg you to write to me on the subject of the republic if there is anything likely to happen. For we have not yet received satisfactory information how Cæsar bare the vote of the senate respecting his authority? There was a report, too, about the people beyond the Po, that they were ordered to elect four magistrates¹. If this be so, I am afraid of great commotions; but I shall learn something from Pompeius².

³ If the word expense be retained, I conceive this to be its proper interpretation.

LETTER III.

ON the 10th of May I came to Pontius in Trebulanum. There your two letters were delivered to me the third day after they had been written. The same day I delivered to Philotimus a letter for you from Pansa's Pompeian villa. At present I have nothing particular to tell you. Pray let me know what are the reports about the republic; for I perceive great apprehensions in the towns here, though much of it is no doubt groundless. But I should be glad to be informed what you think likely to happen, and when. I do not know what letter you wish me to answer; for I have yet received none besides the two, which were delivered to me together in Trebulanum,—one of which contained P. Licinius's proclamation, and was dated the 7th of May—the other was in answer to mine from Minturnæ. I am afraid there may have been something of importance in that which I have not received, to which you wish me to reply. I will put you into favour with Lentulus. I am much pleased with Dionysius. Your servant Nicanor is of great use to me. I have now nothing more to say, and the day already breaks. I intend getting to Beneventum to-day. By my moderation and diligence, I trust I shall give satisfaction. From Pontius' house at Trebulanum, the 11th of May.

LETTER IV.

I CAME to Beneventum the 11th of May, where I received the letter to which you alluded in one that reached me before, and which I answered the same day from Trebulanum by L. Pontius³. In-

¹ It is probable Rufio and Vestorius might have had some dispute, which was to be referred to Cicero's decision.

² I am not ignorant of the term autoritas being applied to such votes of the senate as were prevented from passing into a law. Still it appears to me that the best sense of this passage is by understanding the word to refer to Cæsar's authority, which was at this time attacked by the consul Marcellus, who proposed a decree for shortening the period of his command in Gaul, and preventing one who was not present from being elected consul.

³ The election of four magistrates constituted a free town, and gave the right of voting in the Roman assemblies.

⁵ Cicero having written this letter at Pontius's house, deed I have received two at Beneventum; one of which was brought me early in the morning by Funisulanus; the other by my secretary Tullius. The attention you pay to my first and principal commission¹ is exceedingly grateful to me; but your departure weakens my hope. He brought me to this², not because I was altogether satisfied, but because the want of anything better obliged me to consent. Respecting the other, whom you seem to think not unsuitable, I doubt whether my daughter could be brought to admit him, and it would be difficult for your ladies to find out. On my part I have no objection. But you will be gone, and the business must be settled in my absence. You will consider my situation. For if either of us were there, something might be done by means of Servilius to the satisfaction of Servius: as it is, if this should now be approved, I hardly see how it can be managed. I now come to the letter I received by Tullius, and feel much obliged by your attention about Marcellus. If therefore a decree of the senate should be passed, you will let me know: or if not, you will nevertheless accomplish the business³,—for it must of necessity be granted to me, and to Bibulus. But I do not doubt that the decree of the senate has already been despatched, especially as the populace have their advantage in it. You have done well about Torquatus. It will be time enough to think of Maso and Ligur when they arrive. As to what Chærippus says⁴, since here also you withhold your opinion; O this province! and must be too be satisfied? He must so far be satisfied, that nothing may come before the senate. Consider what is to be done, or pay down the money; for about the others I do not care. It happens however fortunately that you should have talked with Scrofa. What you say about Pontinus is very just. For so it is, that if he comes to Brundisium before the 1st of June, there will be less occasion to press M. Annius and Tullius. I like what you heard from Sicinius⁵, provided the exception does not affect anybody to whom I am under obligations. But I will consider of it: for I approve the thing itself. What I may determine about my journey, and what Pompeius will do about the five prefects⁶, when I have learned from him, I will let you know. Respecting Oppius, you have done right to assure him of the payment of the 800 sestertia (6660!): and now that you have Philotimus with you, bring it is to be supposed that when Cicero proceeded to Beneventum, Pontius at the same time went up to Rome.

¹ This probably refers to the re-marriage of his daughter, who appears to have been separated from Cræses by a divorce. It must not be forgotten that divorces at that time were exceedingly common.

⁴ He seems to have brought up some demand against Cicero, the nature of which is not known.

⁵ It was usual to issue a proclamation upon entering on a provincial government. Cicero had been inquiring what others had done on similar occasions, and it is to this that Sicinius's exception must be supposed to allude.

⁶ See afterwards in letter 7 of this book.

business to an end, and make up the account. And, as you love me before you go away, enable me again to go on.^a You will have relieved me in a great source of uneasiness. I have now relied to all the contents of your letters: though I had almost omitted your want of paper.^b This my concern, if your deficiency obliges you to it less. Take then 200 sesterii (17. 16s.), in order to supply yourself, though the smallness of a sheet shows my own parsimony in this respect; while it demands from you an account of all that done or talked of. If you have any certain intelligence of Cæsar, I hope to hear from you; and more particularly by Pontinius about everything.

LETTER V.

I HAVE positively nothing to say: for I have neither anything to desire of you, considering there has been nothing omitted, nor anything to tell you, for I know nothing, and have no room for joking—so my things press upon me. Know this however, at I send this on the morning of the 15th of May, at setting out from Venusia. On this day it is probable that something will be done in the senate. Therefore your letters follow me, by which I am not only to be made acquainted with all facts, but likewise with the current reports. I shall be glad to receive them at Brundisium, for there I am to wait for Pontinius till the day which you mention. I will give you a particular account of the conversations I may have at Tarentum with Pompeius on the subject of the republic: though I wish to know how long I may properly write to you,—that is, how long you are likely to remain in Rome, that I may know to whom I ought thereafter to deliver my letters, and may not deliver them in vain. But before you go, at all events let me at business be settled of the 20 and the 800 sesterii (166*l.* and 6660*l.*). I wish you would consider this as a thing of the very first importance and necessity; that what I have begun to entertain^b by your recommendation, I may complete by your assistance.

LETTER VI.

I CAME to Tarentum the 18th of May. Having determined to wait for Pontinius, I thought it best to pass the intermediate time with Pompeius, till he should arrive: especially as I found that Pompeius wished it, and even begged me to be with him, and at his house every day: to which I readily agreed,—for I shall get from him many good conversations on the subject of the republic; and shall besides be furnished with instructions suitable for my new office. But I begin now to be shorter in writing to you, from my uncertainty whether you are at Rome or already set out. As long as I remain in this ignorance, I will still write a few lines, rather than suffer an opportunity of sending to you to pass without a letter. At the same time I have now nothing to ask of you, or to tell you. I have made all my requests, which you will execute as you promised; when I have any news, I will tell you. One thing however I shall not cease to urge as long as I suppose you to remain in Rome, that you would leave that business completed respecting the account with Cæsar. I look eagerly for your letters; especially that I may know the time of your departure.

LETTER VII.

I SEND you a letter every day, or rather each day, shorter; for I become every day more apprehensive that you may have set out for Epirus. However, that you may see I have attended to your request, Pompeius says he shall present five new prefects as before, with exemption of service, and with the authority of magistrates^c. After spending three days with Pompeius in his own house, I am going to Brundisium this 20th of May. I leave him an excellent citizen, and fully prepared to repel the evils which are apprehended. I shall hope to get a letter from you, that I may know both what you are doing, and where you are.

LETTER VIII.

IT is now twelve days that I have been detained at Brundisium, partly by indisposition; from which however I am now recovered, having been free from fever; partly by the expectation of Pontinius's arrival, of which I have not yet received any intimation. But I am expecting to sail. If you are at Rome, which I scarcely suppose, but if you are, I should exceedingly wish you to attend to the following circumstance. I received information from Rome that my friend Milo complained in his letters of my unkindness, because Philotimus was a party in the purchase of his goods^d. This I desired to be done by the advice of C. Duro-nius, whom I knew to be much attached to Milo, and such a one as you esteem him. His intentions and mine were, first, that the property might thus come under my control, and that no ill-disposed purchaser might rob him of his slaves, of whom he has a great many with him; then, that the security he had wished to provide for Fausta^e ^c Different conjectures have been formed respecting the text and the meaning of this sentence. It seems to me most probable, that Pompeius was allowed to nominate to Cicero's prefectures, which were often honorary, and while they gave authority, admitted of exemption from service. Cicero only insisted on excluding all persons concerned in traffic. [See letter 11 of this book.] The proper business of the prefect appears to have been to determine causes in such places where there were no authorized magistrates.

^d Philotimus was a freed-man of Terentia, Cicero's wife. Milo had been found guilty of the death of Clodius, and in consequence went into a voluntary exile at Marselles; and his debts being very great, his estate was sold by public auction for the satisfaction of his creditors.

^e Fausta was Milo's wife.

^a This appears to me to be the best interpretation of this passage, and most consistent with the context.

^b This badinage probably refers to some expression in Titius's letter, or, it may be, to the cross line spoken of in letter 1 of this book. This letter contains an unusual number of broken sentences, and short allusions, which involve in them considerable doubt of the true meaning.

^c He speaks of the friendship he had begun to have with Cæsar. The sums stated here and elsewhere, as negotiated between him and Oppius, were apparently due to Cæsar.

might be ratified; added to which, if anything could be saved, that I might the more easily save it. Now I should be glad if you would examine into the whole affair,—for accounts are often exaggerated. But if he complains, if he writes to his friends, if Fausta is of the same mind, do not let Philotimus continue to have any concern in the property, contrary to Milo's wishes; for so I told him in person, and he engaged to do. It was no great object to me. But if what I have heard is undeserving of notice, you will judge what is right. Speak to Duronius. I have written also to Camillus, and to Lamia; and the rather, because I could not depend upon your being in Rome. In short, you will determine what you think most consistent with my honour, my reputation, and my interest.

LETTER IX.

I ARRIVED at Actium^f the 15th of June, having feasted like the Salii^g at Corcyra, and Sybotis, upon the presents which Arcus and my friend Eutyichides^h had splendidly and kindly provided for me. I preferred going from Actium by land, after having had a very unpleasant voyage. The doubling of Leucate too seemed to be attended with difficulty; and I did not think it becoming to proceed to Patræ in a small vessel without my equipage. I daily study myself, and direct my attendants, to carry into effect my determination (in which you often encouraged my speed), to discharge this office, which is out of the commonⁱ course, with the utmost moderation, and the utmost forbearance. I hope that the Parthians will be quiet, and that fortune will favour me: I shall do my part. Pray take care to let me know what you are doing, where you will be at successive times, how you left my affairs at Rome, and above all about the twenty and the eight hundred^j sestertia (166*l*. and 666*0*l*.). This you will accomplish in one letter carefully despatched, so that it may reach me. But (though you are now absent, while the business of the provinces is not under consideration, yet will, as you wrote me word, be present at the time) remember to provide through your own influence, and through all my friends, especially through Hortensius, that my year of service may remain in its present state, and that no addition may be decreed. I am so earnest in this request, that I doubt if I should not even beg you to contend against any intercalation^k.*

^f On the coast of Acarnania in Greece. The same place that was afterwards distinguished by the engagement between Augustus and M. Antonius, which decided the empire of the world.

^g The Salii were priests of Mars, who, at the conclusion of their solemn processions, used to partake of a splendid entertainment; from whence Salsaric feasts derived their name.

^h Arcus and Eutyichides were freed-men belonging to Atticus, whose house at Buthrotum was near to Corcyra and Sybotis, through which Cicero passed after he had crossed the Adriatic. Eutyichides is mentioned before, book iv. letter 15.

ⁱ It was usual for the consuls to take a government immediately upon resigning their office. Cicero having declined this at the time, was now appointed out of the regular course.

^j Mentioned above in letter 5 of this book.

^k This is said jestingly. The irregularities of the year, previous to Caesar's reformation of the calendar, used to be rectified by the occasional insertion of a month, consist-

But I must not impose every burden upon you. At least however be firm upon the subject of the year. My affectionate and dear boy Cicero sends his compliments to you. I have always, as you know, had a regard for Dionysius; but I esteem him more and more every day, and particularly because he loves you, and is continually talking about you.

LETTER X.

HAVING reached Athens the 25th of June, I have been now three days expecting Pontinius, but have yet heard nothing certain about his arrival. I assure you my thoughts have been entirely engaged upon you: and though I was naturally led to this by my own feelings, yet these have been the more lively from the recollection that I was treading in your steps. In short, our whole conversation is about you. But you perhaps wish rather to hear something about me. I have to tell you, then, that hitherto there has been no expense incurred, either publicly or privately upon me, or any of my train. Nothing is received under the sanction of the Julian law^l; nothing from those with whom we lodge. My attendants are all resolved to support my reputation. So far all is well. This being observed, has called forth much discourse and commendation among the Greeks. In what remains to be done, I study to conduct myself, as I understood you to approve. But it will be time to take credit for these matters when we arrive at the peroration and conclusion of the whole. The rest of my concerns are of such a nature that I often reproach myself for not having devised some means of escaping from this employment. How little is it adapted to my habits! How true is that saying—"Every one to his own trade!" You will say—"What has already happened? you have not yet entered upon business." I know not, but I apprehend there is worse to come,—though I bear this, as I hope and believe, to all appearance admirably; but I am worried in my inward feelings, by the many things which are every day arrogantly said or concealed in anger and petulance, and every kind of foolish weakness, which I do not specify,—not from any wish to hide them from you, but because they are irremediable. When I am returned safe, you shall admire my patience: it is a virtue I am deeply studying. But enough of this. Though I had little else to write about, not being able to guess even what you are doing or where you are. Nor was I ever so long in ignorance of my own affairs; what has been done about Caesar's business, what about Milo's; and I have not only seen nobody, but have not so much as heard any report to inform me of what is going on in the republic. If therefore you know anything about these matters, with which you think I should like to be acquainted, you will confer a great kindness upon me by letting me hear it. What is there besides? Nothing truly but this, that I am highly delighted with Athens, with the city itself, and the ing of more or fewer days, at the discretion of the pontiff, between the 23d and 24th of February. This was called an intercalary month.

^l By the Julian law the public officers of Rome were entitled to certain articles of provision in the towns through which they passed.

ornaments of the city; with the affection of the people towards you, and their kindness also to me; but especially with the philosophical spirit which everywhere prevails". If there is any good, it is to be found in Aristus, with whom I lodge,—for I gave up your, or rather my Xeno, to Quintus; but the houses are so near, that we pass whole days together. As soon as you can, let me hear your plans, that I may know what you do, where you are, and, above all, when you will be in Rome.

LETTER XI.

How is this? so often to send letters to Rome, yet none for you? Hereafter, however, I will rather write in vain, than suffer an opportunity to pass without writing to you. I entreat you by your fortunes*, while you are there, to secure by all possible means, that the period of my government may not be prolonged. I cannot tell you how ardently I wish for the city; how ill I bear the impertinences of my present situation. Marcellus has acted shamefully about this citizen of Como°. If he had not held a magistracy, at least he belonged to one of the colonies on the Po†: so that the offence given to our friend Pompeius, appears to me to be no less than that to Cæsar. But this is his concern. I thought also, as you say Varro asserts, that Pompeius was certainly going into Spain. I was sorry for it; and easily persuaded Theophanes that nothing was more to be wished, than that he should not go away anywhere. The Greek° therefore will try what he can do; and his authority has the greatest weight with him. I send this on the 6th of July, the day of my leaving Athens, after having been there ten whole days. Pontinius is arrived; and at the same time Cn. Volusius: the questor† is here; and your Tullius alone absent. I have some open boats belonging to the Rhodians, and some double-oared vessels of the Mityleneans, and others. I hear nothing of the Parthians. For the rest, I trust to the gods. Hitherto I have made my journey through Greece with great applause; nor have I yet any complaint to make of my people; they seem to know me, and my purpose, and the conditions of their service; and are entirely subservient to my good estimation. Henceforth, if that proverb be true, "Like master, like man," they will assuredly continue in the same disposition: for they shall see nothing in me to justify their delinquency. But if this be found insufficient, I shall adopt severer measures; for hitherto I have been gentle and lenient; and, as I hope, not without some effect. But, as some say, I have calculated upon this forbearance only for one year: take care then that I do not lose my character by any prolongation of my government. I now come back to what you desire of me. With regard to the prefects, there shall be an exemption of service for any you please; only name them: I shall not hesitate, as I did in the case of Apuleius. I love Xeno as much as you do, and am confident that he is sensible of it. I have put you in the highest favour with Patron, and the rest of these effeminate philosophers; and have done no more than you deserved; for he told me that you had thrice written to him, to assure him that in consequence of his letter I would take care of that business; which he took very kindly. But upon Patron's applying to me, to request that your Areopagus would cancel the decree they had made in the prætorship of Polycharmus, it appeared both to Xeno, and afterwards to Patron himself, more proper that I should write to Memmius, who had gone to Mitylene the very day before I arrived at Athens, in order that he might signify to his friends his consent to the measure. For Xeno was persuaded that the Areopagus would never grant it against the will of Memmius. But Memmius had already given up all thoughts of building: he was, however, displeased with Patron; which made me write particularly to him a letter, of which I send you a copy. I wish you to comfort Pilia for my sake: for I will tell you; you need not mention it to her; I received a packet, in which was Pilia's letter: I took it, opened it, read it. It was written with great feeling. The letters you received from Brundisium, without any from me, were despatched at a time when I was not well. For I would not have you put off with that servile excuse of business. Take care to let me hear everything; but especially take care of your own health.

LETTER XII.

A SEA voyage is a serious thing, even in July. We were five days coming from Athens to Delos. On the 6th of July we proceeded from the Piræus‡

* It does not appear that the governors of provinces were limited in their appointment of prefects. Cicero only excluded such as carried on any traffic. [See above, letter 7 of this book.] The translation here offered is new, but is most consonant to the words of the original thus pointed, "in præfectis, excusatio in quos volēs: defecto."

† The Epicureans.

‡ Memmius had been obliged to quit Rome, and had taken up his residence at Athens, where he got from the council of the Areopagus a grant to build upon the site of a school of Epicurus. This the supporters of that philosophy were anxious to prevent.

§ It has been doubted to what this alludes, and indeed it is one of those private circumstances which it is impossible to ascertain; but it appears to me most probable that some letter from Pilia to Atticus had fallen by mistake into Cicero's hands, and that it contained some expressions of uneasiness, which Cicero takes this opportunity of requesting her husband to soothe.

¶ The meaning of the original is uncertain. I have supposed it to be "an excuse of being busy;" which he represents as an excuse fit for a slave, who was forced to work.

‡ The port of Athens.

° This appears to me to be the true sense of this disputed passage. Had ἄνευ κείνου related to the ambiguity of the Academic philosophy, I apprehend it would have had the particle ἢ prefixed.

† A form of adjuration elsewhere occurring in Cicero's letters. However unusual it may be in England, it seemed right to preserve this character of the original in the translation.

° It seemed to be out of enmity to Cæsar that the consul Marcellus had ordered a person of Como, to which place Cæsar had extended the rights of citizenship, to be publicly beaten.

† Pompeius's father had before got the same privileges to be given generally to the colonies bordering on the Po. How irregular it was to inflict such a punishment on a Roman citizen may be inferred from the history of St. Paul. Acts xxii. 25.

‡ Theophanes was probably a freed-man of Pompeius, and a Greek.

to Zoeter with a troublesome wind, which detained us there the next day. On the 8th we had a pleasant passage to Ceo. From thence we went to Gyarus with a strong gale, but not unfavourable. We completed our course to Scyrus, and thence to Delus, to both of them quicker than we wished. You are acquainted with the undecked vessels of the Rhodians; there is nothing less calculated to resist the waves. I had, therefore, determined not to hurry, nor to stir from Delus till the indications from the heights should be favourable. As soon as I heard of Messala, I immediately wrote to you from Gyarus; and I also communicated my opinion to Hortensius⁷, with whom I fully sympathised. But I am expecting a letter from you informing me what is said of that judgment, and indeed upon the whole state of the republic, and that a statesman-like letter, since you are reading over my treatise on Government with my friend Thallumetus⁸; so that I may learn not only what is doing (for that even your grave client Helenius could tell), but what will be done hereafter. By the time you read this, the consuls will be appointed. You will be able to perceive with some certainty everything relating to Cæsar, to Pompeius, to the trials themselves. But, I beseech you, since you remain in Rome, clear off my business. What I forgot to answer you about the brick-work⁹, I request you to get done. Respecting the water, if anything can be done, I beg you to manage it with your usual kindness. I do from my own sense of the subject, as well as from your representation, consider it of real importance: therefore accomplish something. If Philippus has asked you to do anything in his affair, I should be glad if you would gratify him. I will write more to you when I am settled; I am now completely in the middle of the sea.

LETTER XIII.

I ARRIVED at Ephesus the 22d of July, the five hundred and sixtieth day after the battle of Bovilla^b. The voyage was performed without danger, and without sickness; but slowly, owing to the weakness of the undecked Rhodian vessels. Of the concourse of deputations, and individuals, and the incredible multitude which came to greet me at Samos, and in an astonishing manner at Ephesus, I imagine you have already heard; or may say, "how does it concern me?" However, both the farmers of the revenue addressed me with as much zeal as if I had come with a command; and the Greeks, as if I had been an Ephesian prætor^d. From which I know you will understand that my ⁷ Messala was related to Hortensius. He had been charged with bribery at his election to the consulship. See book iv. letter 16.

^a Probably one of Atticus's freed-men.

^b This, and what follows about the water, probably refers to his house in Rome.

^c This was the place where Clodius was killed in his affray with Milo. Cicero uses the phrase jestingly, as if its importance constituted a new epoch.

^d It is probable this may have been an expression familiar to Atticus.

^e The farmers of the revenue and the proprietors of the land were likely to be often at variance, the former supporting themselves by the authority of the Roman governor, the latter by that of their own magistrates, whom they therefore respectively courted.

boasting of so many years is now brought to the test^e. But as I hope I shall put in practice the lessons I have learned from you; and shall be able to satisfy all parties; and the more easily, because in my province the compositions^f have already been made. But enough of this; especially as Cæstius informed me, while I was at dinner, that he should set out this very night. I have attended to your little concerns^g at Ephesus; and to Thermus, (who previously to my arrival had generously promised his assistance to all your friends,) yet I have presented Philogenes and Seius, and have recommended Xeno of Apollonidis. He promised to do everything you wished. I have besides explained to Philogenes the account of what I borrowed^h from you. So much for this also. I return to the affairs of the city. I entreat you by your fortunes, since you remain in Rome, first of all to support and secure this, that my government may be but for the year, that there be even no intercalationⁱ. In the next place, finish my commissions; especially if anything can be done in that domestic^j business, in which you know my difficulty: then have a regard to Cæsar^k, whose friendship I have solicited at your recommendation; nor do I regret it. And if you know how much it concerns me to be informed and regardful of what is doing in the republic, (doing^l may, rather what is hereafter to take place,) write everything to me, and exactly; particularly whether the state of the judgments that are either made, or to be made, is attended with difficulty. About the water^l, as you think it worth while. If Philippus should want anything, I shall be obliged to you to attend to it^m.

LETTER XIV.

TILL I am settled in some place, you must not expect me to send you either long letters, or always in my own hand; but when I have time, I will do both. I am now pursuing my journey on a hot and dusty road. I wrote to you yesterday from Ephesus; this I send from Tralles. I expect to be in my province the 1st of August. From that day, if you love me, endeavour to secure the termination of my government after one year. In the mean time I have received intelligence such as I could wish; first, that the Parthians are quiet; then, that the contracts with the farmers of the revenue are completed; lastly, that the sedition of the soldiers has been allayed by Appius, and their pay delivered to them up to the middle of July. I am wonderfully well received in Asia. My arrival has occasioned not the smallest expense to anybody. I hope all my attendants will have regard to my reputation. I have great apprehensions; but hope for the best.

^e By his boasting he probably means his philosophical prudence.

^f These were the contracts entered into annually between the farmers of the revenue and the proprietors.

^g This may have been borrowed from Atticus's own expression.

^h See letter 15 of this book.

ⁱ See letter 9 of this book.

^j This probably alludes to the marriage of his daughter. See letter 4 of this book.

^k See letter 5 of this book.

^m See letter 12 of this book. I conceive this and the former clause to make two distinct sentences.

All my people have now joined me except your friend Tullius. I purpose going directly to the army, to appropriate the remaining summer months to military business, the winter months to civil concerns. I trust that, if you know me to be no less anxious than yourself about the republic, you will send me word of everything that happens, or will happen. You cannot gratify me more: unless by the execution of what I begged you to do, especially that inmost concern^a, which I have so much at heart. I write in haste, and in dust. My future letters shall be more particular.

LETTER XV.

I CAME to Laodicea the 31st of July. From this day you will begin the reckoning of my year. Nothing could be more desired, nothing more affectionately entertained, than my arrival. But it is not to be believed how sick I am of this business. The activity of my mind, with which you are so well acquainted, has not a sufficient field to exert itself, and the notable effect of my industry is lost. Is it for me to administer justice at Laodicea, and A. Plotius at Rome? And while our friend is commanding so large an army, for me to have the name only of two meagre legions? In short, I want not these things; I want the splendour, the forum, the city, my own home, and you. But I will bear it as I can, provided it be but for one year. If my government is prolonged, it is all over with me; but it may very easily be prevented if only you remain at Rome. You ask what I do here. I shall continue to live, as I do, at a great expense. I am wonderfully pleased with the plan I have adopted. I observe a strict self-denial^b, agreeably to your advice; so that I doubt whether it will not be necessary to raise money in order to pay off what I have borrowed of you. I do not exasperate the wounds of Appius^c, but they appear and cannot be concealed. I write this on the 3d of August, on my way from Laodicea to the camp in Lycania. Thence I mean to proceed to Mount Taurus, that I may contend in arms with Mæragenes, and, if I can, may decide the affair of your slave^d. The panniers, as they say, have been put on the wrong beast^e. It is confessedly a burden that does not belong to me, but I will bear it, only, as you love me, let it not exceed the year. Mind to be present in time, that you may solicit the whole senate. I am exceedingly anxious, because it is now a long while that I have remained in ignorance of all that is doing. Therefore, as I have before said to you, make me acquainted, besides other things, with the state itself. Should I write more by a tardy messenger? but I deliver this to a familiar and friendly man, C. Andronicus of Puteoli. You will have frequent opportunities of ^a Probably alluding to the marriage of his daughter.

^b By self-denial is to be understood Cicero's abstinence from all extortion, such as was made a great source of revenue to the provincial governors.

^c Appius had preceded Cicero in the government of Cilicia; the wounds he had inflicted were those of extortion.

^d Mæragenes was the captain of a lawless band, to whom a slave of Atticus's had run away.

^e A proverbial expression, signifying something unsuitable.

sending to me by the messengers of the public renters, through the collectors of the revenue and customs within my district.

LETTER XVI.

WHILE I am on my journey, and actually on the road, the messengers of the public renters are setting out; yet I have thought it right to steal a little time, that you may not think me regardless of your injunction. Accordingly, I have stopped in the road to send you shortly this information, which should have occupied a larger space. My arrival, which was eagerly expected in this miserable and utterly ruined province, took place the last day of July. During three days that I staid at Laodicea, three at Apamea, and three at Synnada, I heard of nothing but the inability of the people to pay the head money imposed upon them; the universal sale of goods; the groans and lamentations of the cities, the fatal traces, not of a man, but of some savage beast. In short, I am sick of everything, even of my life. The wretched cities, however, find some relief in being free from any expense either on my account or that of my lieutenants, questors, or anybody else. For I decline to accept not only forage, and what is allowed by the Julian law, but even my fire-wood; nor does anybody receive a single thing besides four beds, and a roof to cover them; in many places, not so much as that, for we more commonly remain under a tent. Hence we have a surprising concourse from the country, from the villages, and from every house. Indeed they revive again at my approach, at the justice, the moderation, the clemency of your Cicero; so that he has exceeded the expectations of all people. Appius^a, upon hearing that I was coming, went into the remotest part of the province, as far as Tarsus, where he holds a session. I hear nothing of the Parthians; but some, who are lately arrived, relate that our cavalry have been defeated by the barbarians^b. Bibulus does not even yet think of going into his province^c; which people attribute to this, that he wishes to remain there as late as he can. I am hastening to join the army, which is two days distant.

LETTER XVII.

I HAVE received from Rome a packet of letters without one from you; which, if only you were there, and were well, I attribute to the fault of Philotimus, not to you. I dictate this sitting in my carriage, on my way to the camp, from which I am distant two days' journey. In a few days I shall have sure persons to whom I can deliver my letters, therefore I reserve myself for that. However, though I would rather you should hear it from others, I conduct myself in the province with such moderation, that not a penny is spent upon any of my people. This is accomplished also by the attention of the lieutenants, and tribunes, and prefects, for they are all zealous for my honour.

^a Appius was Cicero's predecessor in the province of Cilicia.

^b This is spoken, in the Greek manner, of people unacquainted with the Roman customs and discipline.

^c Syria.

Our friend Lepta is admirable*. But I must be quick. I will tell you everything fully in a few days. The younger Deiotarus, who has received from the senate the title of king, has taken our Cicero[†] with him into his kingdom. While I am in my summer quarters, I considered it to be the best place for the boys. Sestius has informed me of the conversation he had with you on the subject of my domestic and greatest concern[‡], and what was your opinion. I beseech you, pay every attention to that business: and let me know what can be done, and what you think. Sestius likewise said that Hortensius had mentioned something about extending the term of my government. He had distinctly promised me in Cumanum that he would support my release at the end of twelve months. If you have any regard for me, fortify this post[§]. It cannot be told how unwillingly I am kept away from you. Besides, I expect that this honour, which I derive from my moderation, will be the more distinguished, if I soon retire, as it happened to Scævola, who presided in Asia only nine months. Appius, when he understood that I was approaching, removed from Laodicea as far as Tarsus. There he holds a session, while I am in the province; but I shall not quarrel with him for this wrong, for I have enough upon my hands in healing the wounds which have been inflicted on the province, which I endeavour to do with the least censure upon him. But I wish you would tell our friend Brutus that Appius has not behaved handsomely in going away as far as he could upon my approach.

LETTER XVIII.

How I wish you were in Rome, if it happens that you are not there, for I have no certain information, excepting that I have received two letters from you dated the 19th of July, in which it was mentioned that you were going into Epirus about the beginning of August. But whether you are in Rome or in Epirus, the Parthians have passed the Euphrates under the conduct of Pacorus, son of Orodes, king of the Parthians, with almost all his forces. There is yet no news of Bibulus's arrival in Syria. Cassius is in the city of Antioch with his whole army. I am with my army at Cybistra, in Cappadocia, at the foot of Mount Taurus. The enemy is in the Cyrrhestica, which is the part of Syria nearest to my province. I have written to the senate an account of this state of affairs[¶]. If you are at Rome, you will see if you think my letter should be delivered; and many things, nay, everything which require your kind attention, the sum of which is, that between the slaying and the offering[‡], as they say, no additional time or burden

* He was what may be called the chief engineer, and had the direction of the workmen—prefectus fabrum.—Ep. Fam. lib. 7.

† The sons of Marcus and of Quintus Cicero.

‡ Respecting the marriage of his daughter.

§ It may be supposed that Cicero uses this metaphor in consideration of his military character.

¶ This letter is preserved in the beginning of the 15th book of the Familiar Epistles.

‡ The meaning seems to be, that nothing may occur, at some unseasonable moment, to frustrate my designs, and prevent my hopes, of quitting the province at the expiration of the year.

may be laid upon me. For a thin army, the army, and deficiency of arms, at such a time can be depended upon, my best enemy in winter. If that season arrives when I have having passed into my province, the only fear is that the senate, under the agitation of domestic disturbances, may be sending Pompeius go away. But if they make else in the spring, I do not care, provided that be made to my taste. So much for the are in Rome. But if you are gone, and remain there, this is the state of affairs no distrust; and following, as I believe counsels—and possessing, I hope, I men, I feel to be in a safe position, for corn, almost looking down upon Cissicum, is convenient for moving. My army is in trust, unanimous in affection towards me to be doubled by the arrival of Domitius his forces. I have much more to bid anybody else has had, being struck with grief and forbearance. I am writing to Roman citizens, and transporting of fields into places of safety. If it is so, shall defend ourselves by arms; the nature of the country. Therefore, courage; for I see you, and am as full of friendly sympathy as if you were here. But I beg of you, should the worst case be put off till the first of August, would, if possible, be in Rome at that time, feel quite secure if you are there. I am, my friends, and the tribune of the people, still I have need of your assistance and influence. It is a most important business, ashamed of using many words. The young Ciceros are with Deiotarus, and they shall be removed to Rhodes. If you are in Rome, write to me with your usual care. Epirus, yet send me one of your letters, both you may know what I am doing, you do, and mean to do. I attend to the of your friend Brutus in a manner, not do for himself. But I now look forward^b, without defending him, for a fruitless business. Yet I will end in satisfaction, even to you, which is the case with Brutus himself; but I will assuredly

LETTER XIX.

I HAD just sealed the letter which I had have read, written with my own hand, containing an account of everything, when a messenger hastily delivered to me your letter of the 21st of September, the forty-seventh day of leaving Rome. Ah, what a distance! I make no doubt you waited for Pompeius from Ariminum, and are now gone to Brundisium. I fear you will be not less, but, as you are, anxious in Epirus than I am here. I have to Philotimos about the Atellan debt, desiring him not to call upon Messala. I am pleased that the reputation of my progress should have reached you, and I shall be still more pleased if you hear the rest. I am glad you take such delight in the daughter whom you have left in Rome; and though I have never seen her, yet I love her, and am sure she must be amiable. Farewell again and again, patron, and your fellow disciples^c. I am glad you are pleased with what I have effected in the army respecting the Tarentine light cavalry^d. When you say that you are not sorry he^e should have met with a repulse, who contended with your nephew's uncle^f; it is a mark of great affection; and by it you have put me in mind that I ought to rejoice also, for it had not occurred to me. "I cannot believe that," you say. As you please; but yet I rejoice; for being indignant, you know, is very different from being envious^g.

LETTER XX.

On the morning of the Saturnalia (December 17) the Pindenissians surrendered themselves to me, the forty-seventh day after I had begun to besiege them. "Who the plague are these Pindenissians? who are they?" you will say; "I never heard the name." What can I do? Could I convert Cilicia into Ætolia or Macedonia? You must know this, however, that with such an army as I have here, no very great affairs could have been achieved. What has been done I will shortly explain to you; for so, in your last letter, you give me leave to do. You know of my arrival at Ephesus, for you congratulated me on that day's celebrity, than which nothing ever pleased me more. From thence I was honourably received in all the towns where I went, and arrived at Laodicea the last day of July. There I staid two days in great reputation; and by liberal expressions eradicated all former injuries. I did the same at Apamea, where I staid five days; at Synade, where I was three days; at Philomelum five days; and ten days at Iconium. My jurisdiction was exercised with the greatest equity, the greatest lenity, and the greatest dignity. Thence I came into the camp the 26th of August, and on the 30th I reviewed the army near Iconium. From this station, having received praising messages about the Parthians, I proceeded into Cilicia through a part of Cappadocia which borders on the province, with the design of making the Armenian Artavasdes, and the Parthians themselves conceive that they were excluded from Cappadocia. After being encamped five days at Cybistra in Cappadocia, I was informed that the Parthians were at a long distance from that passage of Cappadocia, and were rather threatening Cilicia. Therefore I immediately made my way into Cilicia through the passes of Mount Taurus. I came to Tarsus the 5th of October; thence I went to Mount Amanus, which divides Syria from Cilicia by the opposite course of the waters^h. These mountains were full of eternal enemies. Here, on the 13th of October, we killed a great number of them; and Pontinus having advanced by night, and myself the next morning, we took and burned the forts, which were strongly guarded. I was saluted Imperatorⁱ. I occupied for a few days the very same position, at Issus, which, in his expedition against Darius, had been held by Alexander, not a little better general than either you or me. There I remained five days; and having spoiled and laid waste the Amanus, I departed. For you know that as there are certain things called panics, so there are also the empty rumours of war. The rumour of our approach both encouraged Cassius, who was shut up in Antioch, and alarmed the Parthians; so that Cassius pursued them with advantage as they retreated from the city. In this retreat Osaces, one of the Parthian generals of great authority, received a wound, of which he died a few days after. My name was respected in Syria. In the mean time Bibulus arrived. I imagine he wanted to be equal with me in this empty title. He began to seek for laurels in the Amanus, as if they were strewed upon a cake^j. But he lost the whole of his first cohort, and the centurion of the first division, a man distinguished in his situation, Asinius Dento, and the other officers of the cohort, and Sextus Lucilius, a military tribune, son to T. Gavius Cæpio, a rich and splendid man. In truth he sustained an ugly blow, both in itself and in the time when it happened. I invested Pindenissus with a ditch and rampart: it was a strong place belonging to the free Cilicians, and had time out of mind been in arms against us. The people were a fierce and barbarous race, prepared with all the means of defence. We accomplished the business by a large mound, fascines, a lofty tower, great quantity of machines^k, a numerous body of archers, great fatigue and equipage, and many wounds received, but the army safe. The Saturnalia were truly joyous. I gave up the spoil, excepting the horses, to the soldiers. The slaves were sold on the third day of the Saturnalia. While I write this in the tribunal^l, the sum amounts to 12,000 sester tia (96,000*l.*) I shall leave the command of the army to my brother Quintus, to be taken from hence

^c That is, farewell to the Epicureans, if you so far forget their love of indifference as to become fond of your children. See book vii letter 2.

^d There is reason to believe that the Tarentines were a species of light cavalry. I have thought it right, therefore, to insert this illustration, without which it must be unintelligible to an English reader.

^e This is supposed to relate to Hirrus, who had formerly opposed Cicero for the augurship, and had lately been rejected in his canvass for the office of ædile in opposition to Cælius. The obscurity of this, as of many other passages, arises entirely from our ignorance of Atticus's letter, to which it alludes.

^f A humorous periphrasis for Cicero himself, perhaps taken from Atticus's own expression. It occurs again, [book vi, letter 8,] in relation to the same event.

^g The expression, which in the original is in Greek, seems to be taken from Aristotle. His meaning is, that he may innocently rejoice through indignation against an unworthy candidate, though it would be wrong to rejoice through envy at another's want of success.

^h That is, at the part of the mountains whence the streams descend in opposite directions.

ⁱ This title, as is well known, used to be conferred by the acclamation of the soldiers upon any signal success; the faces were at the same time crowned with laurel. The general retained the title till he returned to Rome.

^j The word in the original signifies a kind of cake, which was covered with laurel leaves, and from which consequently they were easily gathered.

^k These were various instruments for offence, such as continued in use till the introduction of fire-arms.

^l A raised platform, on which the persons in authority were seated.

into winter quarters in a part of the country that is ill pacified, and am going myself to Laodicea. So much for this. But let me revert to what I have omitted. When you particularly advise me; and which is more than all, in what you labour with so much earnestness; that I should satisfy even this Ligurian scoffer^m; may I die, if anything could be said more elegantly. But I do not call this forbearance, for that seems to imply a virtue opposed to pleasure, while in my life I never felt so great a pleasure as I do from this integrity of conduct. Nor is it the reputation (which is very great), but the thing itself that delights me. In short, such has been its value, I did not know myself, nor was I aware what I could do in this kind. I am justly proud. Nothing can be more honourable. In the mean time, it is something splendid that Ariobarzanes should live and reign by my assistance. I have preserved the king and the kingdom, as it were, in passing, by prudence and authority, and making myself inaccessible to his enemies, not merely shut against their presents. At the same time, not the smallest thing has been received from Cappadocia; and I even hope that during the whole year of my government not a farthing of expense will be incurred in the province. Brutus, who was despondingⁿ, I have cheered as much as I could. I love him no less than thou: I had almost said, than thee. This is all I had to tell you. I am now preparing to send a public account to Rome, which will be more full than if I had sent from the Amanus. But am I to understand that you will not be in Rome? Everything depends upon the first of March^o. For I am apprehensive that when the business of the province is taken into consideration, if any resistance is made on the part of Cæsar^p, I may be continued. If you were there to attend to this, I should have no fears. I come now to the affairs of the city, with which, after a long ignorance, I have at length been made acquainted by your most acceptable letter of the 28th of December. Your freed-man Philogenes took great care to send it by a circuitous and not very safe route. For that, which you say was delivered to Lenius's servant, I had not received^q. I was pleased with what you say of Cæsar respecting both the decree of the senate^r and your own hopes. If he submits to this, I am safe. That Leius should have scorched himself in this Platorian conflagration, I am not so much concerned^s. I want to know why Luceius should have been so vehement about Q. Cassius, and what has been done. As soon as I get to Laodicea, I am desired to present your nephew Quintus with his robe^t of manhood. I shall endeavour carefully to regulate his conduct. He, from whom I have derived such great assistance^u, was to come to me at Laodicea, as he said, with the young Ciceros. I am expecting a letter from Epirus, to bring me an account, not only of your occupations, but also of your retirement. Nicanor is in office, and liberally treated by me. I think of sending him to Rome with the public despatches, both for their more careful conveyance, and at the same time that he may bring me back certain intelligence of you, and from you. I am obliged to Alexis^v for his repeated salutations; but why does he not by his own letters follow the example of my Alexis^w to you? I am looking out for a horn^x for Phemius. But it is time to stop. Take care of yourself, and let me know when you think of returning to Rome. Again and again, farewell. When I was at Ephesus, I carefully recommended your affairs and your friends to Thermus; and I now do the same by letter; and I have understood that he is of himself very desirous of serving you. I should be glad if you would use your influence about Pammenus's house, as I before mentioned to you, that what the boy has, through your and my assistance, may not by any means be disturbed. I consider this as a point of honour to both of us, and in will, besides, be particularly acceptable to me.

LETTER XXI.

I was very glad to hear that you had arrived safe in Epirus, and had, as you say, an agreeable passage. I am rather concerned that you will not be in Rome at a period so important to me; but I comfort myself with thinking that you will not like to winter there, and unnecessarily be out of the way^y. Cassius, the brother of your friend Q. Cassius, had sent the letter, of which you ask me the meaning, in a more modest style than that which he sent afterwards, where he pretends to have put an end to the Parthian war. They had indeed retreated from Antioch before the arrival of Bibulus; but not in consequence of any success on our part. They are now in winter quarters in the Cyrrhæstia, and threaten us with a great war. For the son of Orodes, the Parthian king, is in our province^z; and Deiotarus, whose son is engaged to the daughter of Artavasdes^a, from whom it might be known, has no doubt but the king himself will pass the Euphrates with all his forces in the beginning of summer. And the very day that Cassius's victorious letter was read in the senate, which was the 7th of October, mine brought an account of some disturbance. Our friend Axius says that mine carried with it great authority, while no credit was given to the other. Bibulus's had not then been received. I am confident it must have been full of alarm. I am afraid of this consequence from it; that whilst Pompeius is kept at home under the apprehension of seditious commotions, and Cæsar is denied any honour from the senate; while this knot is disentangling, the senate may think I ought not to leave my government before a successor arrives; and that in such a disturbed state of affairs, it is not enough to have single lieutenants preside over such large provinces. Hence I dread some prolongation of my time, which not even the intercession of a tribune can stop; and the more so, because of your absence, who by your opinion, influence, and zeal, might obviate many difficulties. But you will say that I am raising troubles out of my own brain. I cannot help it: and wish it were so. But I am full of fears; though I admired the conclusion of the letter you sent from Buthrotum before you had recovered from your sea-sickness, in which you say—"As far as I see, and hope, you will meet with no impediment to your departure." I should have liked it better, "as I see," without that "hope." I received another, by a very quick passage, at Iconium, through the messengers of the public renters, dated the day of Lentulus's triumph. In this you repeat the same mixture of bitter and sweet, telling me first that I shall have no hindrance; then adding, if it should be otherwise, that you will come to me. Your hesitations sting me. You see by this what letters I have received. For that which you say you gave to Camula, the slave of the centurion Hermon, has never reached me. You repeatedly told me that you had sent one by Lenius's servant. This, which was dated the 22d of September, Lenius at length delivered to me at Laodicea, upon my arrival there the 11th of February. Your recommendations I acknowledged to Lenius immediately in words, and shall do so in deed as long as I stay. The only new subject in this letter related to the Cybiritian panthers^b. I am much obliged to you for answering M. Octavius, that you did not believe I meant to send any. In future, what you do not know to be certain, you may certainly deny. For, my own resolution being inflamed by your opinion, I have exceeded everybody, as you will find, in forbearance, and also in justice, easiness of access, and clemency. There is not anything excites so much surprise, as that no farthing of expense should have been incurred since I obtained the province, either for the state, or for any of my people, excepting L. Tullius the lieutenant. He, who is otherwise abstemious, yet on his journey availed himself of the Julian law. It was only once in the day; not as others had done, in all the villages he passed through; besides him nobody received anything even once; this obliges me to except him, when I assert that no farthing of expense was incurred. Besides him nobody received anything. For this pollution^c I am indebted to Q. Titinius. The campaign being ended, I gave the command of the winter quarters and of Cilicia to my brother Quintus. I sent into Cyprus, Q. Volusius, the son-in-law of your friend Tiberius, a steady man, and besides wonderfully abstemious, to remain there a few days, lest the few Roman citizens, who carry on business in those parts, should think that justice was denied them; for it is illegal to summon the Cypriots out of the island. I went myself on the 5th of January from Tarsus into Asia^d; I cannot tell you with what admiration of the cities of Cilicia, and above all of the Tarsians. And when I had passed the range of the Taurus, a prodigious expectation was raised in the districts of Asia under my jurisdiction, which in six months of my government had received no letter^e from me, and had seen no guest^f. For, before me, that time had always been employed in a species of traffic, by which the opulent cities gave great sums of money to be excused having soldiers quartered upon them in the winter. The Cypriots gave as much as two hundred Attic talents (nearly 10,000*l.*); from which island I speak not hyperbolically, but truly) no money whatever will be exacted under my government. In return for these benefits, at which they express their astonishment, I do not permit them to decree any honours to me, except in words; I forbid all statues, temples, chariots; nor am I burdensome to the cities in any other way—but perhaps I am to you, while I proclaim all this about myself. Bear with me, however, if you love me; for it is you who desired me to do it. In short, I have made my progress through Asia in such a manner, that even famine, than which nothing is more wretched, and which was felt at this time in my part of Asia, owing to the entire failure of the crops, might seem a thing to be wished for by me^g. Wherever I have been, I have employed no force, no legal process, no insult; but have by authority and exhortation, prevailed upon those Greeks^h and Roman citizens, who had corn in store, to promise a large supply to the people. February the 13th, on which day I am writing, I have appointed to hold a session at Laodicea for the affairs of Cybira; the 15th of March for those of Apamea; and at the same time I mean to hold one for Synnada, Pamphylia, (when I shall look out for a horn for Phemiusⁱ) Lycæonia, and Isauria. The middle of May I shall return into Cilicia, to spend there the month of June, I hope unmolested by the Parthians. If things go as I wish, I shall employ July in passing again through the province on my return; for I arrived within the province at Laodicea, in the consulship of Sulpicius and Marcellus, the 31st of July. I must set out on my departure the 29th of July, having first obtained my brother Quintus's consent to his being left in command; which will be very much against both his inclination and mine; but it cannot with propriety be avoided; especially as I cannot even now detain that excellent man Pontinius; for Posthumius, perhaps also Posthumia, snatches him away to Rome. You have here my plans. Now hear what relates to Brutus. Brutus is well acquainted with certain creditors of the Salaminians of Cyprus, M. Scaptius, and P. Matinius, whom he has particularly recommended to me. Matinius I do not know. Scaptius came to me in the camp. I promised that I would take care, for Brutus's sake, that the Salaminians should pay him the money that was owing to him. He thanked me; and at the same time asked to be made a prefect. I said I made it a rule never to appoint anybody engaged in traffic, as I had before told you. When Cn. Pompeius asked me, I gave to him the same answer; likewise to Torquatus, on his application for M. Lenius, your friend; and to several others. If he wished to be made a prefect for the sake of his bond, I would take care he should recover it. He thanked me, and took his leave. Appius had formerly given a few troops of horse to this Scaptius, for the sake of repressing the Salaminians; and had made him a prefect. But he harassed the people of Salamis; and I ordered the horse to remove from Cyprus, which Scaptius took very ill. However, that I might keep my promise to him, when the Salaminians came to me at Tarsus, and Scaptius with them, I ordered them to pay the money. They said a great deal about the bond, and about the ill-usage they had received from Scaptius. I said I could not listen to it. I exhorted; I begged, in return for the kindness I had shown towards their city, that they would conclude the business; at last I said I should compel them. Upon this they not only did not refuse, but they added, that they would pay then out of me. For as I had not accepted what they had been used to give to their governors, they in some measure gave it from my revenue; indeed the amount of Scaptius's debt was less than the prætorian tribute. I commended them. Right, says Scaptius, but let us reckon up the amount. In the mean time, while I had declared in my opening proclamation, composed from different models¹, that I should maintain the interest of one per cent. per month, together with what accrued at the end of the year, he by the terms of his bond demanded four per cent. "What do you mean," said I; "can I act contrary to my proclamation?" He then produced a decree of the senate in the consulship of Lentulus and Philippus, that whoever obtained the province of Cilicia, should pronounce judgment according to that bond. I was at first struck with horror; for it would have been the ruin of the city. But I find two decrees of the senate in the same year respecting this bond. The Salaminians, when they were desirous of raising money at Rome, were prevented by the Gabinian law. Upon which these friends of Brutus, relying upon his influence, offered to advance the money at four per cent. per month, if it could be authorised by a decree of the senate. Through the favour of Brutus, a decree was passed, "that no detriment should arise to the Salaminians, nor to those who furnished the money." They accordingly paid the money. But it afterwards occurred to them, that the decree would be of no use to them, since the Gabinian law prohibited the establishing a right upon the terms of a bond. Thereupon another decree of the senate was passed, "that this bond should have the same validity as others." But to return: while I was explaining this, Scaptius drew me aside, saying that he did not mean to oppose my judgment; but that they believed they owed him two hundred talents (about 10,000*l.*), and this sum he was willing to accept: that they really owed him something less; but he wished me to bring them to this agreement. Very well, said I. So I called them to me, after Scaptius had retired, and asked them what they offered, and what was the amount of their debt. They replied, one hundred and six talents, (about 5100*l.*). I reported this to Scaptius. The man began to clamour. "What is the use of this?" said I. "Compare your accounts." They sat down, and made their computation, which agreed to a sixpence. They said they were ready to pay it, and pressed him to take it. Here Scaptius again called me aside, and begged that I would leave the matter as it stood. I gave way to his shameless request; and when the Greeks complained, and desired leave to deposit the money in some temple¹, I did not grant it. Everybody present exclaimed that nothing could be more shameless than Scaptius, who was not satisfied with one per cent. per month, with the annual compound interest; some said nothing could be more foolish. But to me he appeared more impudent than foolish. For thus he either satisfied himself with good security at one per cent., or took his chance for four per cent. on security which was not good. This is the statement of my case; which must be approved by Brutus, or he will no longer deserve our regard. It will assuredly be approved by his uncle², especially as a decree of the senate was lately passed, I believe after your departure, on the subject of creditors, that one per cent. should constantly be taken without compound interest. What difference this makes, if I rightly know your fingers³, you have certainly computed. On this subject, by-the-by, Luccius complains to me by letter that there is great danger lest these decrees should lead, by the fault of the senate, to cancelling the old accounts. He refers to the mischief, which C. Julius formerly occasioned by the procrastination of a single day⁴; the state never was in greater jeopardy. But to return to the business: consider my case against Brutus; if this may be called a case, where nothing can with honour be said in opposition; especially as I have left the whole affair open. What I have to say besides, relates to my private concerns. On that secret business⁵ I quite agree with you. We should think of Posthumia's son, since Pontidia's seems to be trifling with us. But I wish you were there. BOOK VI.

LETTER I.

I RECEIVED your letter at Laodicea on the fifth day before the festival of the Terminalia^a, and read it with the greatest pleasure; for it was full of affection, of kindness, of attention, and diligence. To this therefore I will reply, as you desire; and shall not follow my own arrangement, but the order which you have adopted. You say that you have very recently got my letter from Cybistra, dated the 22nd of September; and you wish to know what letters of yours I have received. Almost all that you mention, except those which you say you sent by Lentulus' servant from Equotuticum and Brandisium. So that your pains have not been thrown away, as you apprehend; but have been admirably laid out; provided it was your purpose to gratify me: for nothing gives me greater pleasure. I am particularly glad that you approve of my reserve towards Appius, and my freedom towards Brutus. I had thought it might have been otherwise. For Appius had written to me two or three letters on his journey, complaining that I had rescinded some of his regulations. As if, when a patient changes his physician, he that was first in attendance should quarrel with his successor for deviating from the treatment which he had adopted. Just so Appius: having treated his province by depletion, having let it bleed, and used every sort of evacuation, and delivered it up to me quite exhausted, now does not like to see it recruited under my care; but sometimes finds fault, while at other times he returns thanks; for I have avoided any personal reflection upon him. The dissimilarity alone of my conduct offends him. What indeed can be so dissimilar, as that the province, under his government, should have been drained with expenses and losses; and that from the time I have held it, there should have been no charge of a single penny, either privately or publicly? to say nothing of his prefects, his attendants, and lieutenants; his plunderers also, his licentiousness, and insults: whereas now there is no private house managed with such prudence, such regularity, such moderation, as the whole of my province. This some friends of Appius absurdly misrepresent, as if I was studious of applause at his expense; and did my duty not for the sake of my own reputation, but of his discredit. But if Appius, agreeably to Brutus's letter which I have sent you, expresses his thanks to me, I do not trouble myself about it: nevertheless, on the very day that I am writing before it is light, I think of abolishing many of his unjust acts and regulations. I come now to Brutus, whose interests I have embraced with the greatest warmth, at your desire; and for whom I had begun to entertain affection; but—shall I speak it? I check myself from fear of offending you. Do not, however, imagine that I have anything more at heart than to do as he directs; or that there is anything about which I have taken more pains. He gave me a list of instructions; and you had already conferred with me upon the same subjects; all of which I have prosecuted with the greatest diligence. In the first place, I have laboured to make Ariobarzanes pay him the talents he promised to give me. As long as the king remained with me, the transaction went on very well: afterwards he began to be pressed hard by a multitude of Pompeius's agents: and Pompeius has alone more authority than all other people; because, in addition to other reasons, it is thought he will come to the Parthian war. He is now paid by instalments of thirty-three Attic talents (6000*l.) every month; and that is scarcely sufficient for the monthly interest. But our friend Cnæus^b bears this patiently. He is without his principal; and is satisfied with the interest, though it is incomplete. Ariobarzanes pays nobody else, nor can he pay; for his treasury is exhausted, and he has no revenue. By Appius's ordinance, he demands tributes; but these hardly furnish the interest due to Pompeius. The king has two or three very rich friends; but they keep what belongs to them with as much care as I or you. On my part, however, I do not cease by letter, to entreat, to persuade, to upbraid the king. Deiotarus has, likewise, told me that he has sent messengers to him about Brutus's business; who brought him back word that the king has nothing. In truth, I believe nothing can be more plundered than that kingdom, nothing more indigent than the king: so that I think either of renouncing my wardship; or, like Scævola in the case of Glabrio, of refusing to pay the interest and charges upon his debts. However, to M. Scaptius^c and L. Gavius, who managed Brutus's business in the kingdom, I have given the prefectures which I promised Brutus through you, as they did not trade within my province: for you remember my conditions, that he should take what prefectures he pleased, provided it was not for one engaged in traffic. I had, therefore, given him two besides. But the persons for whom he had asked had left the province. Now let me explain to you the affair of the Salaminians, which I perceive is as new to you as it was to me: for I never understood from Brutus that the money belonged to him. Indeed I have his own memorandum, in which it is said, "The Salaminians owe money to M. Scaptius and P. Matinius, my intimate friends." These he recommends to me; and adds, as a sort of spur, that he was himself surety for them to a large amount. I had arranged that the Salaminians should repay it at twelve per cent. for six years, with an accruing interest at the end of each year. But Scaptius demanded forty-eight per cent. I was afraid, if he had obtained this, that you would yourself cease to love me. For I should have receded from my own proclamation; and should have utterly ruined a city placed under the protection of Cato, and of Brutus himself, and distinguished by my benefits". At this very time Scaptius suddenly produces a letter of Brutus, saying that the affair was at his own risk; which he had never mentioned either to me or you; and, at the same time, requesting that I would make Scaptius a prefect. But I had, through you, made this exception, that it must not be a person engaged in traffic. Or if I did appoint anybody, least of all could I appoint him; because he had been a prefect under Appius, and having some troops of horse, had actually besieged the senate in their house of assembly at Salamis, in consequence of which five senators had been starved to death. As soon as I received information of this from certain Cypriots, who were sent to meet me at Ephesus, I wrote the very day I reached the province, to remove the troops out of the island. On this account I imagine Scaptius must have written unfavourably of me to Brutus. This, however, is my feeling upon the subject: if Brutus should think that I ought to have awarded the forty-eight per cent., after having maintained the interest of twelve per cent. through the whole province, and declared it in my proclamation, and even had the concurrence of the severest usurers; or if he should complain of my refusing a prefecture to one engaged in trade, which I have refused to Torquatus, in the case of your friend Lenius, and to Pompeius himself, in the case of Sex. Statius, and have received their approbation of my conduct; or if he should be offended at my withdrawing the troops; I shall be sorry indeed to have incurred his displeasure, but much more so to find him a different man from what I had supposed. This, however, Scaptius must acknowledge, that he was enabled to receive all the money according to the terms of my decree. I may add, too, what I doubt if you will yourself approve: for the interest ought to have stood as it was in the decree; and the Salaminians wished accordingly to deposit it: but I prevailed upon them to forbear. They gave way to me indeed; but what is to become of them if Paullus should succeed to the province? All this I did for Brutus' sake, who has written to you very kindly about me: but to me, even when he is asking a favour, he writes in a dogmatical, haughty, uncivil manner. I wish you would write to him upon these matters, that I may know how he takes it: for you will inform me. I had indeed particularly mentioned this subject to you in a former letter⁷; but I would have you distinctly understand that I had not forgot what you said in some of your letters, that if I brought back from this province nothing else besides his favour, it was sufficient. Be it so, since you desire it: but with this condition I presume that I incur no guilt. Accordingly I decreed the payment of Scaptius's debt without delay. How properly the decree was formed I leave you to judge. I shall not appeal even to Cato. But do not suppose I have thrown aside your exhortations, which are imprinted in my bosom. With tears in your eyes you commended to me my reputation. What letter of yours is there in which you do not advert to it? Let then who will be angry; I shall be content with having right on my side; especially as I have bound myself by six books⁸, as it were so many pledges, with which I am rejoiced to find you so well pleased. In these you doubt about one historical fact, relating to Cneius the son of M. Flavius. But he did not live before the time of the decemviri: for he was curule-edile; which was an office instituted many years after the decemviri. What then was the use of his publishing the table of the festivals? It is supposed to have been at some time concealed, with the view of making it necessary to consult the few upon the proper days for transacting business. And many authors assert, that Cn. Flavius the scribe published the list of festivals, and composed the formularies of legal process; that you may not suppose it to be my invention, or, rather that of Africanus, for it is he that speaks. What is said about the gesture of a player has not escaped you. You entertain a wicked suspicion⁹; I wrote it in perfect simplicity. You say that you heard of my being saluted imperator through Philotimus. But I take for granted, since you have been in Epirus, you have received from me two letters, with a full account of everything; one from Pindenissus presently after its capture, the other from Laodicea, both delivered to your servants. Upon the same subject I sent public despatches to Rome by two different messengers, for fear of the accidents of a sea voyage. About my daughter Tullia I agree with you; and have written to her, and to Terentia, to express my concurrence. For you had before said—"and I could wish you had gone back to your own flock¹⁰." The correction of the letter brought by Memmius was a matter of no difficulty: for I greatly prefer him from Pontidia¹¹ to the other from Servilia: therefore you may get the assistance of Aufius, who has always been very friendly to me; and now may be expected to be still more so, as he ought to succeed to his brother Appius's¹² affection towards me, along with the rest of his inheritance. He often declared how much he esteemed me; and showed it in the affair of Bursa*. You will relieve me from a great source of anxiety†. I am not pleased with Furnius's exception‡; for the only time that I dread is the one which he excepts. I should write more to you upon this subject if you were at Rome. I am not surprised that you place all hope of peace in Pompeius. So it is: and I think that the charge of dissimulation§ must be removed. If the arrangement of my letter is confused, you must attribute it to yourself; for I follow you in your sudden transitions. The young Ciceros are attached to each other, and pursue their studies and exercises together; but, as Isocrates said of Ephorus and Theopompus¶, one wants a bridle, the other a spur. I mean to present Quintus with his gown¶ of manhood on the festival of Bacchus (March 18), as his father desired. I shall observe the day, on the presumption of there being no intercalation. I am very much pleased with Dionysius. The boys say that he is very passionate; but there can be nobody of more learning, or better morals, or more attached to you and me. It is with justice that you hear the commendations of Thermus and Silius: they conduct themselves most honourably. Add also M. Nonius, Bibulus, me, if you will. I wish Scrofa had an opportunity of distinguishing himself; for it is a situation of splendour‡. The others discredit the administration of Cato. I am much obliged to you for having recommended my cause: to Hortensius. Dionysius thinks there is no hope about Amianus. I have been able to obtain no trace of Terentius. Mæragenes™ must certainly be dead. I have passed through his property, on which there was not a living creature remaining. I did not know this at the time I spoke to your freed-man Democritus. I have ordered the Rhosiac™ vases. But, pray what are you thinking of? In wrought dishes and splendid covers you use to entertain me with a dinner of herbs: what then can I suppose you will serve up in earthenware? Directions have been given to search out a horn for Phemius⁹: it will no doubt be found. I trust he will perform something worthy of it. We are threatened with a Parthian war. Cassius has sent a foolish letter⁹. Bibulus's has not yet been received; when it is read, I imagine the senate will at length be roused. For my own part, I am in great perplexity. If, as I hope, the term of my service is not extended, I have still fears about June and July. Yet, suppose any irruption to be made, Bibulus will surely be able to hold out for two months. But what will be the situation of him whom I leave there; especially if it be my brother? or what will be my own, if I do not take my departure so soon? This is a great difficulty. I have, however, agreed with Deiotarus, that he is to join my camp with all his forces. He has thirty cohorts of 400 men each, armed in our manner; and 2000 horse. He will support us till Pompeius arrives; who, by the letters I have received from him, gives me to understand that the business will be left to him. The Parthians have taken up their winter quarters in the Roman province⁹. Orodes' himself is expected. In short, there is some stir. I have made no deviation from Bibulus's proclamation, besides that exception about which you wrote to me, as containing a reflection upon our order*. I have adopted what is equivalent, but more guarded, from the Asiatic proclamation of Q. Mucius, son to Publius, "that covenants should be performed with good faith, excepting when the transaction was of such a nature that it could not properly be observed." I have also followed many parts of Scævola's; among the rest, that which the Greeks consider as the restoration of their freedom; that, in settling their disputes with each other, they should use their own laws. The proclamation is a short one, because of my having divided it under two distinct heads: one of them provincial; in which is contained what relates to the public accounts of the cities, to debts, interest of money, contracts, likewise all the concerns of the public renters: the other embraces what could not conveniently be determined without a proclamation, the entering upon inheritances and property, the appointment of commissioners and sales of effects; which are usually demanded and executed under a decree of the governor. A third head, concerning the determination of all other causes, I left unwritten, professing to regulate my decrees of this sort by those of Rome. Thus I endeavour, and hitherto succeed in giving general satisfaction. The Greeks are delighted with having judges of their own nation. Poor ones, you will say. What does it signify? at least they think they have obtained their freedom by it. For your people truly have dignified judges in the persons of Turpio the cobbler, and Vettius the broker. You wish to know what I mean to do with the renters. I make much of them, I humour them, I commend them in words, and pay them honours; but take care they shall not be vexatious to anybody. What is most extraordinary, even Servilius abided by the interest of money, as it had been ratified in their contracts. But I manage thus: I appoint a day at a considerable distance, before which if they pay what is due, I give notice that I shall estimate the interest at twelve per cent.; but if they do not pay, then I leave them to their contract. By these means both the Greeks pay at a reasonable interest, and the renters get an arrangement which is very acceptable. Such is the present state of things; they have verbal honour in full measure, and frequent invitations. In short, they are all so well with me, that everybody thinks himself to be the most so. But withal, "there is nothing"—you know the rest. About the statue of Africanus (how unconnected the subjects! but this very circumstance delights me in your letter;) what say you? Does not this Scipio Metellus know that his own ancestor was never censor? Yet on the statue, which you had placed in that elevated situation in the temple of Ops, there was inscribed nothing but "Consul." Likewise on that which is in the temple of Pollux there is inscribed "Consul;" and, that it was of this same Africanus, the attitude, the dress, the ring, the likeness itself declares: in fact, when in that crowd of gilt knights, which this Metellus placed in the capitol, I observed the statue of Africanus with the inscription of Serapion, I supposed it to be an error of the workman; but now I see it was Metellus's. What a disgraceful ignorance! Respecting Flavius, and the festivals, if it is a mistake, at least it is a general one; and you have very properly doubted; and I was near following the common opinion; as is done in many of the circumstances related by the Greek historians. For who has not asserted that the Enpolis of the ancient comedy was thrown into the sea by Alcibiades as he was sailing to Sicily? Yet Eratosthenes has confuted it, by adducing plays which he wrote after that time. But is Duris of Samos, therefore, an historian of great research, to be reviled because he has made the same mistake as many others? Who has not said that Zaleucus composed laws for the Locrians? And is Theophrastus then to be scorned, because the circumstance is contradicted by your favourite Timæus? But not to know that his own ancestor had not been censor, is disgraceful: especially as, during the remainder of his life after his consulship, no Cornelius whatever had been censor. As to what you say of Philotimus, and the payment of the 20,600 sesterii (165*l.*), I understand that Philotimus came to the Chersonesus^a about the beginning of January; but I have yet received nothing from him. Camillus sends me word that he has received the residue which belonged to me; what that is I know not, and should be glad to know. But of these matters hereafter. Perhaps they can best be settled when we meet. One thing, my Atticus, towards the conclusion of your letter disturbed me: for you write thus—"What more?" Then you go on to entreat me in the most friendly manner, "not to relax in my vigilance, and to take care what is done." Have you then heard anything wrong of anybody? Though assuredly there is nothing of the kind; far from it. For it would not have escaped me, nor will it. Yet that admonition of yours, so particular, seems to indicate something.

^a In the original there are only two Greek words, the beginning of some sentence familiar to Atticus, but not known at this time; of course the sense is matter of conjecture, in which state I have thought it best to leave it.

^v To collect debts. See book vi. letter 5.

Respecting M. Octavius, I now reply to you a second time, that you have given him^w a very proper answer. I wish you had done it a little more confidently. For Cælius sent his freed-man to me with a very civil letter; but spake of the panthers, and of the cities^x, most foully. I wrote word back that, in the first place, I was sorry I should be so little known in this obscurity, as to have it yet unheard in Rome that no expenses were imposed upon the people of my province, but for the payment of debts: and I informed him that it was neither lawful for me to procure the money he wanted, nor for him to receive it: and I admonished him, whom I really love, that having been himself the accuser of others^y, he should conduct himself more cautiously. In the next place, I gave him to understand that it was inconsistent with my honour, to make the Cybritans have a public hunting by my command. Lepta is in raptures with your letter; for it is beautifully written, and has put me in high favour with him. I am much obliged to your daughter for having expressly desired you to send me her good wishes: I am obliged to Pilia also: but the former has been more forward in her kindness, by greeting me, whom she has yet never seen. Do you, therefore, in return make my compliments to both of them. A passage of your letter dated the 31st of December contained a grateful recollection of the celebrated oath^z, which I had not forgotten: for on that day I was great in my robe of honour. You have my reply to all the subjects of your letters: not, as you ask me, gold for brass^a; but like for like. But there is another little letter, which I must not leave unanswered. Lucceius might indeed very well give up his Tusculanum^b; unless, perhaps, that he likes to retire there with his piper. I should be glad to know what is the real state of his affairs. I hear, too, that our friend Lentulus has offered for sale his Tusculanum on account of his debts. I wish to see them both free; and likewise Sestius, and add, if you please, Cælius: to all of whom may be applied that verse of Homer, "They were ashamed to refuse, and afraid to accept." I imagine you have heard of Curio's intention of proposing the recall of Memmius. About the security of Egnatius Sidicinus^c, I have yet some hope, though not much. Pinarus, whom you commend to me, is very unwell: but Deiotarus takes great care of him in his sickness. I have now replied also to your little letter. I hope you will let me frequently hear from you

^y It was he who had accused C. Antonius of corruption.

^z When upon resigning the consulship on the 31st of December, Cicero having been invidiously forbid to harangue the people, adroitly altered the usual oath, and instead of swearing that he had faithfully discharged his duty, he swore that the republic and city of Rome had been saved by his means.

^a Alluding to Diomed's exchanging his brazen armour for Glaucus's of gold, mentioned in Homer.

^b I suspect Cicero may have used the word Tusculanum only in reference to his own villa of that name.

^c The application is a little uncertain, but is generally supposed to signify, that these persons were ashamed of refusing the offers held out to them by Caesar in their necessities, yet afraid of accepting them.

^d Probably some creditor of Cicero.

hile I remain at Laodicea, that is, till the 15th of lay; and when you come to Athens (for by that me we shall know about the city business, and bout the provinces, which are all deferred to the outh of March), send me a special messenger. ut is it true that you have, through Herodes, ready got from Cæsar fifty Attic talents (9000*l.*)? y which, as I hear, you have greatly incurred the displeasure of Pompeius; for he thinks you have evoured what belonged to him; and that Cæsar ill become the more active in building at the 'rove'. I heard this from P. Vedius, a great rodigal, but well acquainted with Pompeius. his Vedius met me with two light carriages, and larger one suitably equipped, and a litter, and a reat retinue; for which, if Curio's law should ave passed¹, he will be obliged to pay a hundred estertia (800*l.*). He had besides a dog-headed sonkey in the carriage, and some wild asses. I ever saw a more extravagant fellow. But hear he conclusion. He lodged at Laodicea with Pom- eius Vindullus, and there he left his equipage hen he came to me. Presently Vindullus dies, hich event it is thought will concern Pompeius agnus². C. Vennonius comes to Vindullus's ouse; and as he was sealing the effects, he lights pon the things belonging to Vedius. Among hese were found five laguncule³ of married women, ne of the sister of a friend of yours, a brutish¹ nan, who associates with him, and wife of that rerry Lepidus, who bears these things so care- slessly. I wished to send you this history by-the- y; for we are both of us very curious. There is ne thing besides I would have you consider. I m told that Appius is erecting a portico at Eleusis. Should I be foolish, if I were to erect ne at the Academy¹? I think so, you will say. Then you must give it me in writing. I am very ond of Athens, and should like to leave some emorial, while I hate false inscriptions on other persons' statues. But as it shall please you. You will also inform me on what day the Roman mys- teries fall²; and how you pass the winter. Take care of your health. The seven hundred and sixty- fifth day after the battle of Leuctra¹.

⁵ A joking expression for Brutus, admissible only in such joking relations. The word Lepidus is afterwards introduced in a similar manner.

LETTER II.

YOUR freed-man, Philogenes, having called to pay his respects to me at Laodicea, saying that he was going to cross the sea to you immediately, I send this letter by him in answer to that which I received through Brutus's courier; and I shall reply first to your last page, which has given me great uneasiness, owing to what Cincius has written about Statius's conversation, in which it is very vexatious that Statius should say I approved that design¹. I approve it! Upon this subject, I have only to say, that it is my wish to have as many bonds of connexion with you as possible,—though the strongest of all are still those of affection; so far am I from wishing to loosen any of those by which we are united. But that he² is apt to speak too harshly about these matters I have often experienced, and have often appeased his anger, as I believe you know. And in this excursion or campaign of mine, I have repeatedly seen him in- flamed with rage and calmed again. What he may have written to Statius, I know not. But, what- ever he meant to do in an affair of that kind, at least he ought not to have detailed it to his freed- man. I will, however, use my utmost endeavours that nothing may be done contrary to our wishes, and to his duty; for it is not enough in such a case, for every one merely to attend to his own conduct. The boy, or now the young man, Cicero³, has especially his part in this duty; of which, indeed, I often remind him: and he seems to me to bear great affection, as he ought, towards his mother, and remarkably so towards you. He is a boy of good parts, but unsteady; in regulating which I have enough to do. Having now in my first page answered your last, I shall return to the beginning of your letter. In applying the term maritime⁴ to all the cities of the Peloponnesus, I have followed the synopsis of Dicæarchus, no in- considerable author, but one approved even by your judgment. In relating Chæron's⁵ account of Trophionus's cave, he finds great fault with the Greeks for having so adhered to the sea-coast, and does not accept any place in the Peloponnesus. Though I was pleased with the author, (for he was well versed in history, and had lived in the Peloponnesus,) yet I was surprised; and communicated my doubts to Dionysius. He was at first struck with it; but having as good an opinion of Dicæarchus, as you can have of C. Vestorius, or I of M. Cluvius, he thought I might safely trust him. He reckoned a certain place called Leprium to be a maritime town of Arcadia; and considered Tene and Aliphra and Tritia as recently built, which he confirmed by Homer's catalogue of the ships, in which there is no mention made of them. And I transcribed that passage from Dicæarchus in so many words. I knew that the Phliasiens were so called; and would have you put it in your copy: I have it so. But at first I was misled by analogy; Phlius, Opus, Sipus, from whence are derived Opuntii, Sipuntii; but I presently corrected it. I understand you are pleased with my moderation and forbearance. You would be more so if you were here. In this court, which I hold at Laodicea from the middle of February to the end of April for all the departments except Cilicia, I have been able to effect wonders; so many cities have been set free from all debt, so many greatly relieved, and all, by being allowed to use their own laws and judicature, have revived as if they had gained their freedom. There are two ways by which I have enabled them to discharge, or at least to diminish, their debts. One, by putting them to no expense within my government: when I say none, I am not speaking hyperbolically, but mean literally none, not a farthing. From this alone it is incredible how the cities have been relieved. Another was, that there were surprising impositions practised by the Greeks themselves, in the persons of their magistrates. I instituted an inquiry myself, respecting those who had held magistracies within the last ten years, and they openly confessed. Therefore, without any public disgrace, they were left to restore to the people their money. And the people, who in this present lustrum¹ had paid nothing, have without murmuring discharged even what was due of the lustrum preceding. So that I am in favour with the renters; a grateful set of people, you will say. I am sensible of it. The rest of my administration has been mild and courteous, and not inconsistent.

³ Quintus's son.

⁵ Chæron seems to have been one of the speakers intro- duced in a work of Dicæarchus, upon the descent into Trophionus's cave.

The access to me has been by no means such as is usual in the provincial governments. There has been no intriguing with the chamberlain. I am up and walking before it is light, as I used to do when I was a candidate. This is great, and well received; and is not laborious to me, from the habit of that ancient service. On the 7th of May I think of going into Cilicia; and after spending the month of June there (I wish it may be in peace, for we are threatened with a great war from the Parthians,) to employ July on my return. For my year of office expires the 30th of July, and I am in great hope that no extension of the time will be made. I have the city registers to the 7th of March, by which I find that, by the perseverance of my friend Curio, everything is likely to be passed rather than the business of the provinces². I hope, therefore, that I shall very soon see you. I come now to your friend, nay, my friend Brutus, for so you will have it. I have done everything that I could do in my province, or that I could attempt in the kingdom³. I have exerted myself with the king in every way, and continue to do so daily by letter. For I had him three or four days with me in a disturbed state of his affairs, from which I have extricated him. And both personally, and afterwards by reiterated letters, I have not ceased to beg and entreat him for my sake, and to advise and persuade him for his own. I have been able to do a good deal; but how much I do not exactly know, owing to my great distance from him. The Salaminians, however, (for these I could force,) I have brought to express their readiness to pay the whole account to Scaptius, on condition of paying interest at twelve per cent. reckoned from the last contract, and not merely twelve per cent. throughout, but with the interest added to the principal at the end of each year. The money was paid down; but Scaptius refused to take it. And do you say then that Brutus is content to sustain some loss? It was forty-eight per cent. in the contract. The thing was impossible; nor if it had been possible could I have suffered it. I hear now that Scaptius repents. For what he affirmed to be by a decree of the senate, that the contract should be good in law, was done from this consideration, that the Salaminians had raised money contrary to the Gabinian law. For the law of Aulus Gabinus forbids the cognizance of such bonds. The senate therefore decreed, that the bond should be cognizable. It consequently possesses just the same authority as others, and nothing more. This statement of what has passed, I think Brutus himself must approve. How you may approve it I cannot say; Cato certainly will. But to return to you; can you, my Atticus, who praise so highly my integrity and politeness, can you from your own mouth, as Ennius says, ask me to send troops to Scaptius, for the purpose of extortion? Would you if you were with me, who sometimes say that you are vexed at not being so, would you suffer me to do it if I wished it? "Not more," you say, "than fifty men." There were at first not so many with Spartacus⁴. And what mischief would they not have done in so exposed an island? But would they not have done it? Nay, what did they not do before my arrival? They kept the senate of the Salaminians shut up in their meeting-room so many days, that some of them perished with hunger. For Scaptius was a prefect under Appius, and had some troops from him. Do you then, whose image is presented to my mind as often as I think of anything honourable and praiseworthy,—do you, I say, ask me to make Scaptius a prefect? I had formerly made a resolution to appoint nobody engaged in traffic, and Brutus approved of it. Should he have cavalry? why rather than infantry? Scaptius I suppose is grown prodigal of his money. The principal people you say wish it. I know how much they wish it: for they came as far as Ephesus to meet me, and with tears related the infamous conduct of the cavalry, and their own miseries. In consequence, I immediately despatched letters to have the troops removed from Cyprus before a certain day; and for this, among other reasons, the Salaminians applaud me to the skies in their decrees. But what need of troops now? For the Salaminians already pay,—unless indeed I wished to compel them by force of arms to reckon the interest at forty-eight per cent. And if I were to do such a thing, should I ever dare to read or look into those books⁵ which you commend? In this business, my sweet Atticus, you have shown too much, yes, too much regard to Brutus: I fear I may have shown too little. I have acknowledged, in a letter to Brutus, that you mentioned these particulars to me. Now let me turn to something else. I shall here do all I can for Appius⁶, constently however with my honour, but most readily; I bear him no ill-will, and have a great regard to Brutus⁷, and Pompeius wonderfully presses it, whom in truth I love more and more every day. You have heard that C. Cælius is coming hither as questor. I do not know how it is but that æmilian business does not please me⁸. I hope to be at Athens in the month of September. I would be glad to know the times of your movements. I was acquainted with the simplicity of Æmpronius Rufus, by your letter from Corcyra. What think you? I envy the superiority of Vestorius⁹. I should like still to prattle on, but the day talks: the throng increases; and Philogenes is listening to depart. I must therefore bid you farewell, and beg that you will make my compliments to Pilia and to our little Cæcilia, when you write. My son Cicero sends his kind regards.

LETTER III.

THOUGH I have no news to tell you of anything that has happened since I wrote to you by your freed-man Philogenes, yet as I am going to send hilotimus to Rome, I will not let him go without few lines to you; and first, what particularly concerns me, (not that you can at all help me, for the business does not admit of delay, and you are long way off, and, as it is said, "the wind rolls away waves of the wide sea between us"), the day as you see creeps on; for I leave the province the 6th of July, and there is yet no successor appointed. Whom shall I leave to take the command of the province? Reason and general expectation all for my brother; in the first place, because he is esteemed an honour, and therefore nobody is more proper; in the next place, because he is the only person I have of prætorian rank. For Pontius by the terms of his agreement, (having come at upon that condition,) has already left me. Nobody thinks my questor^b of sufficient dignity,—or he is volatile, licentious, and touchy. But with regard to my brother, the first consideration is, that I imagine he would not easily be prevailed upon, for he dislikes the province, and in truth nothing can be more disagreeable or more troublesome. Then, supposing he should not choose to refuse me, what ought I to do? For, at a time when there is thought to be a great war in Syria, and that likely to force its way into this province, while there is here no defence, and supplies voted only for the year that is expiring,—what affection does it argue to leave my brother? or what attention to my duty to leave a mere trifler? You see, therefore, under what difficulties I labour, and how much I stand in need of advice. In short, I did not wish to have anything to do with this whole business^c. How much preferable is your province^d! You can leave it when you please, (unless perhaps you may have left it already,) and you may appoint over Thesprotia and^e Chaonia whomsoever you think fit. However, I have not yet seen Quintus, to know whether, if I wished it, he could be brought to agree to it; nor, if he could, am I sure what I should wish. So much then for this. The rest is hitherto full of praise and thanks, and not unworthy of those books which you are pleased to commend. Cities have been preserved; the renters have been abundantly satisfied; nobody has been hurt by any insult, very few by the severe justice of my decrees, and nobody so that he dare complain. Deeds have been accomplished that would justify a triumph; about which I shall do nothing in a hurry, and nothing at all without your advice. The only difficulty is in delivering up the province; and this some god must determine. Respecting the affairs of the city, you know more than I; you have more frequent and more certain intelligence. Indeed I am concerned that I should not myself have received information from your letters, for there were unpleasant reports here about Curio and Paullus^f. Not that I apprehend any danger while Pompeius stands or even sits^g by us; let him but have his health. But yet I lament the condition of Curio and Paullus, with whom I am well acquainted. If therefore you are now in Rome, or whenever you are there, I should wish you to send me a sketch of the whole state, which may meet me, and by which I may fashion myself, and consider beforehand in what disposition of mind I should approach the city. For it is something not to be quite a stranger and uninformed upon my arrival. I had almost forgot to add, that for your friend Brutus' sake, as I have repeatedly written to you, I have done everything I could. The Cypriots paid down the money, but Scaptius was not satisfied with the interest of twelve per cent. accumulating at the end of each year. Pompeius has not been able to get more from Ariobarzanes through his own influence, than Brutus has got through mine, though it was impossible for me to ensure him. For the king was very poor; and I was so far off that I could only act by letters, with which I have not ceased to press him. The result is, that in proportion to the amount, Brutus comes off better than Pompeius: for about one hundred talents (20,000*l.*) have been procured for Brutus in the course of the year; and in six months two hundred (40,000*l.*) have been promised to Pompeius. But in the affair of Appius, it can hardly be told what consideration I have had for Brutus. Why then should I vex myself? His friends are mere trifles, Matinius, and Scaptius; who because he could not get from me a troop of horse to harass the Cypriots, as he had done before, is perhaps angry; or because he is not a prefect, which I have granted to nobody engaged in traffic; not to C. Vennonius, my own familiar acquaintance; nor to yours, M. Lenius. This I told you in Rome that I meant to observe; and I have persevered in it. But what reason can he have to complain, who refused to take the money when it was offered him? The other Scaptius who was in Cappadocia is, I imagine, satisfied. Upon receiving from me the appointment of tribune, which I offered him at the request of Brutus, he afterwards wrote to me to say that he did not wish to accept it. There is a person by the name of Gavius, whom I also made prefect by Brutus's desire; but he thought fit to say and to do many things against me, mixed with abuse,—a very spaniel of P. Clodius. This fellow neither escorted me on my way to Apamea; nor afterwards, when he had come to the camp and was returning again, did he ask if I had any commands; and he was, I know not why, manifestly unfriendly. If I had employed such a man as prefect, what would you think of me? I, who as you know could never bear the insolence of the most powerful men, should I bear it in this hireling? though it is something more than bearing it, to bestow a place of emolument and honour. This Gavius then, seeing me lately at Apamea on his way to Rome, addressed me thus: (I should hardly venture to address Culleolus^b in such a manner:) "Whence," says he, "am I to get my allowances as prefect?" I replied, with more gentleness than those who were present thought I ought to have done, "that I was not used to give allowances to those whose services were not wanted." He went away in a passion. If Brutus can be moved with the anger of such a worthless fellow, you may love him by yourself, I shall not be your rival. But I think Brutus will show himself to be what he ought. I wished however that you might be acquainted with the real state of the case; and I have sent an exact account of it to Brutus himself. Between ourselves, Brutus positively sends me no letters, not even lately about Appius, in which there is not something haughty and unfriendly. It is a saying often in your mouth, that "Granius did not undervalue himself, and hated proud kings!"; in which however he rather excites my smile than my anger; but he is in truth too regardless of what he writes or to whom. Q. Cicero the son has I suppose, nay, certainly, read the letter addressed to his father. For he is in the habit of opening them, and that by my advice, in case there should be anything of importance to be known. In that letter was the same notice about your sister which you mentioned to me. I saw the young man wonderfully moved, and he uttered his grief to me in tears. In short, I observed a great degree of filial affection, of sweetness, and kindness; from which I entertain the greater hope that nothing will be done hastily^c. This I wished you to be acquainted with. I am sorry to add that young Hortensius has been conducting himself in a very unbecoming and disgraceful manner at the exhibition of gladiators at Laodicea. I invited him to dinner for his father's sake the day he arrived; and for the same father's sake I have done nothing more^d. He told me that he should wait for me at Athens, that we might return home together. "Very well," said I; for what could I say? In fact I imagine what he said is nothing at all. I should certainly be sorry from fear of offending the father, for whom I have a great regard. If he should go with me, I will so manage him as not to give offence where I should be very sorry to do it. I have nothing more to say, but that I should be glad if you would send me Q. Celer's speech against M. Servilius. Let me hear from you soon. If there is no news, at least let me hear by your messenger that there is none. My regards to Pilia and your daughter. Farewell.

LETTER IV.

I ARRIVED at Tarsus the 5th of June, where I met with several things which gave me uneasiness. There is a great war in Syria, great depredations in Cilicia, and any plan of administration is rendered difficult by reason of the short time that remains of my yearly office. But above all, my greatest difficulty is, that I am obliged by the decree of the senate to leave somebody in charge of the government. Nothing could be more unfit than the questor Mescinius¹; and of Cælius² I yet hear nothing. It seems most proper to leave my brother with the command; but in this there are some unpleasant circumstances, such as my own departure, the danger of a war, the irregularities of the soldiers, and six hundred things besides. How hateful is the whole business! But this I must leave to fortune, since there is little opportunity for the exercise of prudence. When you are come safely, as I hope, to Rome, you will with your accustomed kindness see about everything which you think concerns me; and, in the first place, about my dear Tullia, respecting whose establishment I have written my opinion to Terentia, while you were in Greece. The next thing to be considered is my honour. For in your absence I fear there has hardly been sufficient attention paid in the senate to my letters. I shall besides write a few words to you more mysteriously, which your sagacity will be able to unravel. My wife's freed-man (you know whom I mean³) has seemed to me lately, by what he has incautiously let out, to have confused the calculations arising from the sale of the goods of the Crotonian tyrannicide⁴. And I fear—Do you understand me? Looking then yourself alone into this, secure the residue⁵. I cannot write all that I fear. Contrive that your letters may fly to meet me. I have written this hastily on my journey, and surrounded by troops. You will make my compliments to Pilia, and to the pretty little Cæcilia⁶.

¹ His character is given in letter 3 of this book. The questors were not usually appointed by the commanders.

² See letter 2 of this book.

³ Philotimus. See book v. letter 8.

⁴ Milo, of the same name as a celebrated prize-fighter of Crotona. The addition of tyrannicide, it is almost needless to add, relates to his having killed Clodius.

⁵ It seems probable that Cicero's fears might arise from some suspicion of his wife's having availed herself of her authority over her freed-man Philotimus to appropriate to her use part of the money obtained from the sale of Milo's goods. [See book v. letter 8; book xi. letters 16 and 22; and book xi. letter 2, note v.] She appears to have been an improvident woman, and to have involved Cicero in debts. [Life of Cicero, p. 195.] What I have rendered "secure the residue," I suppose to allude to what is said in letter 1 of this book, towards the end—"Camillus sends me word that he has received the residue." The same thing is repeated in letter 5 of this book. "See after the residue."

⁶ Atticus's daughter, called also Attica.

^b By Culleolus it is evident that Cicero means some low person, but whom it is not known.

^c The original is taken from Ennius. I apprehend it to have been familiarly applied to Brutus by his friend Atticus.

^d This no doubt refers to the report of Quintus's divorce, mentioned in letter 2 of this book.

^e Hortensius had quarrelled with his son, who seems to have been an ill-conditioned young man.

LETTER V.

Br this time I presume you are in Rome, where, if it is so, I congratulate you upon your safe arrival. As long as you were away, you seemed to be further from me than if you were at home, for I was more a stranger to the state, both of the public affairs, and of my own. Therefore, although I hope that I shall already have made some progress on my way by the time you read this, yet I should wish you to let me hear frequently from you, with every particular, upon all subjects; especially upon what I before mentioned to you, that my wife's freed-man has appeared to me, by his frequent hesitation and shuffling, in different meetings and conversations, to have admitted some incorrectness into his computation of the Crotonian's property. Be so good as to inquire into this with your usual kindness, but especially this: "From the walls of the city on the seven hills he delivered to Camillus¹ an account of debts to the amount of 24 and 48 minæ (76*l.* and 153*l.*); that he owed 24 minæ from the Crotonian property; and from that of the Chersonesus² 48 minæ; and having entered upon a succession of 1280 minæ (4096*l.*), he had not paid a farthing, though the whole was due the first of February: his own freed-man, a namesake of Conon's father³, had been wholly inattentive." In the first place, therefore, take care that the principal may be all secured; then, that the interest from the fore-mentioned day may not be overlooked. I had great fears whilst I suffered him to be here; for he came to make observations, not without some hopes. But failing in this, he went away abruptly, saying, "I give up;" at the same time quoting a verse of Homer, that it is discreditable to remain long and return empty⁴. And he reproached me with the old saying, "What is given," &c⁵. See after the residue⁶; and as far as possible let me clearly understand it. Though I have now almost served my yearly term, for there are only thirty-three days remaining, yet I am greatly harassed by the anxious state of the province. For while Syria is blazing with arms, and Bibulus in the midst of his sad affliction⁷ sustains the chief burden of the war; and his lieutenants, and quæstor, and friends, are sending to me to come to their assistance; though my army is but weak, yet, having good auxiliaries of the Galatians, Pisidians, and Lydians, which constitute its strength, I have thought it my duty to keep them as near as possible to the enemy, so long as the decree of the senate authorises me to preside over the province. But, what gives me great satisfaction, Bibulus is not importunate with me, but rather writes to inform me of everything. In the mean time the day of my departure creeps on unobserved. As soon as it arrives, it will be another question whom I shall leave in the command; unless Calvus Cælius, the new quæstor, should be come, of whom I have yet heard nothing certain. I intended to have written a longer letter, but I have nothing more to say, and am too full of care to trifle and joke. Farewell, therefore, and make my compliments to the dear little Attica, and to my friend Pilia.

(Græv. vii.)

YOUNG Quintus has, with all duty, reconciled the mind of his father to your sister. It is true that I encouraged him, but when he was already in his course. Your letter, too, was a great incitement. In short, I trust the affair will terminate as we wish. I have already written to you two letters about my private concerns, if only they have been delivered. They were in Greek, and in purposed ambiguity. But there is no occasion to do anything, besides simply asking about Milo's account, and exhorting him to use despatch as he promised me: you may thus be of some service. I have desired the quæstor Mescinius to wait at Laodicea, that I may get the accounts made out agreeably to the Julian law, and left in two of the provincial cities. I design to go to Rhodes for the sake of the boys, and thence as soon as possible to Athens, though the winds are very much against us; but I want to reach home during the year of the present magistrates, whose good-will I have experienced in the decree for a supplication¹. But let me hear from you on my way, whether you think I ought to take more time, out of respect to the republic. I should have written by Tiro, but have left him very ill at Issus. They send me word, however, that he is better; but I am much concerned for him. For nothing can be more modest, or more attentive, than that young man.

LETTER VII.

(Græv. vi.)

WHILST in everything I support Appian's honour in the province, I am on a sudden become father-in-law to his accuser². "May it turn out happily!" you say. I hope it may, and I am sure that you wish it. But, believe me, I thought of nothing less, and had sent some confidential persons to the ladies about Tiberius Nero, who had applied to me on the subject. When they came to Rome the contract was already made. I hope this may be a more desirable party. I understand the ladies are exceedingly delighted with the young man's courtesy and complaisance. You must not try to pick out defects. But how is this? Do you distribute bread to the populace at Athens? Do you think this right? Though my treatise³ does not forbid it; for this is no bribe amongst fellow-citizens, but a liberal acknowledgment of hospitality. You still advise me to think of the portico for the Academy^c, though Appius no longer thinks of that at Eleusis. I am sure you must be sorry for Hortensius^d. I am myself deeply concerned; for I had looked forwards to living with him in great familiarity. I have appointed Cælius to the charge of the province. "A mere boy," you will say, "and perhaps giddy, and undignified, and intemperate." I acknowledge it, but it could not be otherwise; for I was struck with the letter I had received from you some time since, in which you said that you doubted what I ought to do about resigning the command. I saw what was the cause of your doubt, and was sensible of the difficulty; that I was delivering it to a boy: but it was not desirable to deliver it to my brother; and, besides my brother, there was nobody whom I could with propriety advance before the questor, especially as he was a person of noble birth. However, so long as the Parthians seemed to threaten us, I had determined either to leave my brother in the command, or even, for the sake of the republic, to remain myself, contrary to the decree of the senate. But since by a most unexpected good fortune they have retired, my doubt has been removed. I foresaw what would be said: "So, has he resigned to his brother? Is this holding the government for not more than a year? What avails it that the senate wished the provinces to devolve upon such as had not before had a command; while this^e man has commanded for three years together?" This then is what I say in public^f. But what shall I say to you? I should never be free from anxiety, lest he should do something angrily, or disrespectfully, or carelessly, for such is the condition of mankind. What if his son should be guilty of some imprudence, a boy of great self-confidence? What vexation would it give me! For his father would not send him away, and was not pleased that you should advise it. But as for Cælius, I do not say that I care not what he does; but however I care much less. Add to this, that Pompeius, a man of that weight and experience, appointed Q. Cassius; and Cæsar, Antonius, without the form of a ballot^g; should I offend one who is given me by ballot? and thereby induce him to pry into the conduct of the person whom I had left? What I have done is preferable, and is warranted by many precedents, and is more suited to my age^h. But,

^c See letter 1 of this book.

^d Hortensius was lately dead. It appears from the preface to Cicero's treatise "De Claris Oratoribus," that he heard of this event at Rhodes on his return from Cilicia. And it is on this account that I have transposed the order of this and the preceding letter, which it is evident was written previous to his arrival at Rhodes.

^e Q. Cicero had held the provincial government of Asia three years.

^f The meaning is, that this anticipation of what might be objected to him, is the reason he professes for not appointing his brother. To Atticus he subjoins the real reason, which is his fear of some misconduct from his brother's hasty disposition.

^g The questors seem to have been usually appointed by the government at home after a ballot. Cassius and Antonius, though irregularly appointed, were left in the command, one of Spain, the other of Gaul, at as early an age as Cælius.

^h An age when it became desirable to avoid contentions, ye gods! in what favour have I put you with him, by reading to him, I do not say your letter, but that of your secretary. The letters of my friends invite me to demand a triumph, a thing, as I think, not to be despised in this regenerationⁱ of my fortunes. Therefore, my Atticus, do you also begin to wish it, that I may not be discountenanced.

LETTER VIII.

As I was going to write to you, and had actually taken up my pen, Batonius came directly from the ship to the house in which I was at Ephesus, and delivered to me your letter of September 30. I rejoice at your favourable passage, your meeting with Phila, and, not least, at her conversation about the marriage of my daughter Tullia. But Batonius has brought me strange alarms respecting Cæsar: to Leptra he has spoken yet more at large. I hope his news may not be true; it is certainly dreadful: that he will on no account dismiss his army; and that the prætors elect, and Cassius the tribune of the people, and the consul Lentulus, support him, while Pompeius thinks of retiring from the city. But how is this? Are you at all troubled for him, who sets himself before the uncle of your sister's son^j? And who are they that have defeated him? But to my purpose. The Etesian winds have greatly retarded me; and this undecked vessel of the Rhodians has made me lose twenty days. Whilst I am on the point of embarking from Ephesus, I deliver this letter to L. Tarquitius, who leaves the port at the same time, but will sail quicker. For in these open vessels, and other long boats of the Rhodians, we must watch for fair weather. I have, however, made as much haste as I could. I am pleased with what you say of the Puteolan crumbs^k. Now I should wish you carefully to consider the state of the Roman affair, and see what you think should be determined about demanding a triumph, to which my friends invite me. I should be quite easy about it, if Bibulus was not trying for it; who, as long as there was one enemy^l in Syria, no more put his foot out of the gate than he had formerly done out of his house^m. But now it is disgraceful to be silent. However, consider the whole matter, that as soon such as might be excited against him, if he offended his questor.

ⁱ Having begun, as it were, a new life, after his restoration from banishment, a life which required the support of new honours: for, before that event, the fame of his consulship had been such, as to make him disregard them.

^j The same expression is used in reference to the same event, book v. letter 19, and is no doubt taken from something said upon that occasion. The person alluded to is generally acknowledged to be Mithridates.

^k The word in the original, raudusculum, or raudusculum, is probably derived from rudus, "rubbish," and thence is used for the "sweepings," "crumbs," or "little remains" of a debt. It is used in the same sense, book iv. letter 8.

^l In the text it is hostes, "stranger:" but I have thought it better to adopt the very easy alteration of hostis, agreeably to book vii. letter 2.

^m Bibulus, when he was joint consul with Cæsar, had been insulted and violently driven from the forum; in consequence of which he afterwards shut himself up in his house, and acted only by the publication of edicts. See book ii. letter 21.

as we meet, I may be able to make my determination. But I am writing more than enough; for I have no time to spare, and am sending by one who will either arrive with me or not much before. Cicero^a presents his compliments. You will present those of both of us to Filia and to your daughter.

LETTER IX.

IMMEDIATELY upon my landing in the Piræus^o the 14th of October, I received from my servant Acastus your letter, which I had long expected; but before I unsealed it, I took notice of its shortness; when I had opened it, I was struck with the unevenness of the letters, which you generally form very correctly and distinctly. In short, I perceived from thence, what you mention to be the case, that you came to Rome the 20th of September with a fever. Being greatly concerned, though not more than I ought, I immediately inquired of Acastus. He assured me that both you and he thought you were quite well, and that he had the same account from your own people; at the same time that he acknowledged, conformably to the conclusion of your letter, that you had some degree of fever at the time you wrote. I am very sensible of your kindness, yet surprised that you should nevertheless have written with your own hand. But enough of this; for I hope from your prudence and temperance, nay, as Acastus bids me, I trust, that you are, as I wish you, already well. I am glad you received the letter I sent you by Turannius. Watch, specially, if you love me, the greediness^p of this

^a The son.

^o The port of Athens.

^p In the original is a Greek word, derived from Philotimus, which marks the meaning of the author. The term "confounder" refers to the confusion which Philoconfounder. Take care that he do not touch this Præcian inheritance, how little soever it may be. It gives me much concern, for I had a great regard for the man. Say that I have need of money for the splendour of my triumph; in regard to which, as you advise, you shall find me neither vain in demanding it, nor insensible in rejecting it. I understand by your letter, that Turannius told you I had consigned the province to my brother. Do you think I should so ill interpret your guarded expression, when you say you doubted^q? What need was there of doubt, if there was any reason for wishing my brother to be left, and such a brother? It was to my mind a prohibition, not a doubt. You advise me by no means to leave the young Quintus Cicero. That is the very exposition of my own sentiments. We have seen everything in the same light as if we had conversed together. It could not be done otherwise; and your continued doubt freed me from all doubt. But I imagine you have received a letter written more fully upon this subject. I mean to send my messenger to-morrow, who will probably arrive before our friend Saufeius; yet it was hardly right to let him go to you without a letter from me. Write to me as you promise, about my dear Tullia, that is, about Dolabella; about the republic, which I foresee is in great danger; about the censors, especially what is done about statues and pictures, whether any proposition is made^r. I send this letter on the 15th of October, the day on which, as you say, Cæsar is to bring four legions to Placentia. What, I beseech you, is to become of us? I enjoy my present station in the citadel at Athens.

timus had admitted into his accounts. See letters 4 and 5 of this book. See letter 6 of this book.

^r It was probably expected that the censors might introduce some regulations upon these articles, with the view of repressing the luxury of the age.

BOOK VII.

LETTER I.

I SENT a letter by L. Saufeius, and to you alone^q; for though I had hardly time to write, yet I did not like that one so intimate should go to you without a letter from me. But, considering the rate that philosophers travel, I imagine this will reach you first. If, however, you have received that, you will know that I came to Athens the 14th of October; and that upon landing in the Piræus, I received your letter from my friend Acastus, not without uneasiness at your having arrived at Rome with a fever. I was, however, relieved by hearing from Acastus that you were as much better as I could wish. But I quite shudder at the information which your letter brought about Cæsar's legions. I also begged you to take care that the greediness (or, as the Greeks call it, the philotimia) of your know whom^t, might not injure me; about which I had written to you some time ago. Turannius had misinformed you at Brundisium, as I learned by a letter from that excellent man Xeno.

^q This is the last letter of the preceding book.

^t This is evidently said in allusion to Philotimus.

I explained shortly why I had not left my brother in charge of the province. This was the substance of that letter. Now hear the rest. I entreat you by your fortunes, to employ all the affection with which you embrace me, and all your prudence, which I always admire, in taking into consideration the whole of my situation. For I seem to see such a contest; unless the same Providence, which delivered me from the Parthian war, better than I dared to hope, should have compassion upon the republic; such I say as never was before. But this calamity is common to me with everybody else; upon this I do not require your advice. That which is my own affair I beg you to undertake. Do you perceive how, at your instance, I have attached myself to both parties? And I wish I had from the first attended to your friendly admonition. "But," as Homer says, "your persuasions did not reach my heart; for nothing is sweeter than one's country." At length, however, you did persuade me to embrace the one, because he had been so kind to me; the other, because he was so powerful. I have done it, therefore, and done it with all readiness, so that nobody is more esteemed by either of them. For I considered that my connexion with Pompeius did not oblige me to transgress against the republic; nor, because I agreed with Cæsar, was I to fight against Pompeius; such was their union. Now, as you show, and as I plainly see, the utmost contention between them is to be apprehended. And each reckons me of his side, unless one of them feigns. For Pompeius does not doubt (and he judges rightly) of my highly approving his present sentiments with regard to the republic. I have received letters to this effect from both of them, at the same time that you received yours; as if neither esteemed anybody more than me. What should I do then? I do not mean when they come to extremities; for if it is to be decided by arms, I am clear that it is better to be conquered with the one, than to conquer with the other; but I speak of the questions which will be agitated at the period of my arrival; whether one, who is absent, be eligible; whether he should not dismiss his army. "Speak, Marcus Tullius." What shall I say? Wait, I beseech you, till I can see Atticus. There is no room for trifling. Shall I oppose Cæsar? Where then is our* strict attachment? For, I helped to procure him this permission by applying to Cælius the tribune of the people at the request of Pompeius himself^a at Ravenna. "Of Pompeius?" Even of our Cæsar, in that famous third consulate. Should I now change my sentiments? "I have too much respect (not only for Pompeius, but) for the Trojan men and women. Polydamus will be the first to reproach me." Who? You yourself, who are used to commend both my actions and my writings. I have escaped this blow during the two preceding consulates of the Marcelli, when Cæsar's province was taken into consideration. Now I fall into the very crisis. There let any blockhead give his opinion first; I am mightily pleased to be engaged about my triumph, and to have so good an excuse for remaining without the city. Yet people will try to elicit my sentiments. You will perhaps laugh at what I am going to say. How I should wish even now to be staying in my province! It was clearly desirable if this was hanging over us, though nothing could be more disagreeable. For, by-the-bye, I would have you know, that all those first appearances, which in your letters you commended to the skies, have dissolved away. The practice of virtue itself is not an easy thing; but how difficult is a continual pretence of it! For when I thought it right and honourable, out of the yearly sums which had been voted for my expenses, to leave a yearly sum for the quaestor C. Cælius, and to bring into the treasury a thousand sestertia (8000*l.*); my attendants murmured, thinking it ought all to have been divided amongst them; as if I should be more attentive to the treasures of the Phrygians and Cilicians, than to our own. But they did not move me: for my own applause has the greatest weight with me. Yet there is nothing that could be done for the honour of any person, which I have omitted. But this, as Thucydides says, is an excursion from the subject, not without its use. But pray consider my situation; how, in the first place, I may retain the favour of Cæsar; then about my triumph; which, unless the times of the republic prevent it, I conceive to be easily attainable. I judge so both from the letters of my friends, and from the supplication, when he, who did not vote for it, voted more than if he had decreed the greatest triumph^a. With him Favonius, my familiar friend, was one who concurred in opinion; another was Hirrus, who was angry with me. Yet Cato was present at the drawing up of the decree, and wrote to me most pleasantly upon the subject of his vote. But Cæsar, in congratulating with me about the supplication, exults upon the opinion delivered by Cato; but mentions nothing of what Cato said upon the occasion; only that he voted against the supplication. I come back to Hirrus. You had begun to reconcile him to me: go on with it. You have Scrofa, you have Silius to assist you. I have already written to them and to Hirrus himself. For he had kindly informed them, that he could have stopped it, but did not choose to do so: but that he had concurred with Cato my particular friend, when he made such honourable mention of me; and that I had not written to him, though I wrote to everybody else. He said truly; for to him alone, and to Crassipes, I had not written. So much then for public affairs. Let us return home. I wish to separate myself from that man^b. He has strangely perplexed my accounts, a very Lartidius^c; "but let us leave what is already done, however we may regret it." Let us despatch the rest; and this first, in which I have some care added to my affliction; but this Præcian affair^d, whatever it is, I should be sorry to have confounded with those accounts of mine which he has in his hands. I have written to Terentia^e, and likewise to him, that I should put together in your hands whatever money I could collect, for the equipment of my expected triumph. This, I conceive, must be unobjectionable. But as they please. Take upon you this care also^f, how we may endeavour to accomplish what you propose. This both you have pointed out in some letter, (from Epirus was it? or from Athens?) and I will assist you in it.

* So I understand this, which has usually been otherwise interpreted.

^a It is most consonant with what follows to understand this of Pompeius.

^b This is quoted from Homer. The same verses are found in letter 5, book ii.

LETTER II.

I ARRIVED at Brundisium the 24th of November, after as favourable a voyage as your own; so charmingly did a gentle gale waft us from Epirus. The words have run into a verse, which, if you please, you may impose upon some young man for your own. I am much concerned at your illness; for your letters show that you are very far from well; and I, who know your fortitude, suspect it must be something serious that obliges you to give way.

* Cato resisted the application for Cicero's supplication; but at the same time spoke of him in the most honourable terms.

^a Philotimus.

^b It is not known who this is.

^c See book vi. letter 9.

^d Philotimus was Terentia's freed-man, and perhaps involved with her in embarrassing Cicero's accounts.

^e I conceive the conclusion of this letter to relate altogether to some new subject mentioned previously by Atticus, and not improbably concerning Q. Cicero, or Pomponia, whose disagreement is mentioned, book vi. letter 2.

and almost overpowers you; though your servant Pamphilus assured me that the quartan fits of your ague had left you, and that another milder form had succeeded; and Terentia, who came to the gate of Brundisium at the same time that I entered the harbour, and who met me in the forum, said that L. Pontius had informed her in Trebulanum, that this also had left you: which, if it be so, is what I exceedingly wish, and hope indeed that your prudence and temperance may have effected. I come now to your letters, of which I have received six hundred^d at once, each more acceptable than the former, and all in your own hand. I used to love Alexis's handwriting, because it bore so near a resemblance to your own; yet I loved it not, as showing that you were not well. The mention of his name brings to my mind Tiro*, whom I have left sick at Patræ; a young man, as you know; and add, if you please, an honest one; I know nothing better. Therefore I miss him sadly; and though he did not think himself dangerously ill, yet I cannot help being anxious about him, and place my greatest hope in the attention of M. Curius[†], which Tiro has signified to me by letter, and many persons have mentioned. Curius himself is sensible how much you wish him to be in my esteem: and indeed I am highly pleased with him; for he possesses a natural urbanity of manners which is very amiable. He has a will sealed with the seals of the Ciceros[‡] and those of the prætorian[§] cohort, in which he has openly bequeathed to you a pound, to me a half-penny^{||}. I was sumptuously entertained by Alexion[¶] at Actium in Corcyra[‡]. There was no resisting Cicero's wish of seeing Thyamis[¶]. I am rejoiced that you take pleasure in your little girl, and that the affection of parents towards their children is proved to you to be natural[¶]. For without this there can be no natural union between man and man; and if this is taken away, the very intercourse of life is destroyed. May it turn out well, said Carneades grossly; yet more modestly than our friend Lucius[¶], and Patron; who in referring everything to their own gratification, do not[¶] think any thing whatever should be done for the sake of another; and when they say that the reason why a man ought to be good, is that he may escape harm, not because it is naturally right; they do not perceive that they are describing a crafty man instead of a good man. But this I believe is in those books[¶], which you encourage me by praising. I return to my subject. I was eagerly expecting the letter, which you had sent by Philoxenus; for you had mentioned that it contained an account of your conversation with Pompeius at Naples; this Patron delivered to me at Brundisium. I believe he had received it at Corcyra. Nothing could be more acceptable. For it related to the republic; to the opinion which he entertained of my integrity; to the kindness which he showed in his discourse about the triumph. But what pleased me most of all was, that I understood you had visited him for the purpose of discovering his disposition towards me: this, I say, was the circumstance most agreeable to me. With respect to the triumph, however, I never had any wish for it before that barefaced letter of Bibulus, which was followed by so full a supplication. Had he really done what he described, I should rejoice, and favour his pretensions. But now, that he, who never set his foot beyond the gate so long as the enemy was on this side the Euphrates, should be loaded with honours; and that I, on whose troops his army placed their whole reliance, should not attain the same; this is a disgrace to us; to us, I say, including you. I shall therefore make every exertion, and hope I shall succeed. If you were well, I might already have had some particulars investigated: but I trust you will soon be well. I love you for this Numerian remnant[¶]. I want to know what is become of Hortensius[¶]; what Cato is doing, who has in truth been shamefully hostile towards me. He gave me his testimony for integrity, justice, clemency, fidelity, which I did not ask; what I did ask, he refused. How therefore does Cæsar, in the same letter in which he congratulates me and promises every thing, exult in the injury I have received from Cato's ingratitude? Yet this very man voted to Bibulus a supplication of 20 days. Pardon me; I cannot bear this, nor will I. I wish to reply to all your letters; but there is no occasion, since I shall see you so soon. But as to that business of Chrysippus (for about the other, a mere mechanic, I was less surprised, though nothing could be worse than his conduct); but for Chrysippus, whom on account of some little proficiency in learning I entertained with kindness, and had in esteem; that he should leave the boy without my knowledge! I omit many other things which I hear of him; I omit his thefts; but his running away I cannot bear; there is nothing that I think more wicked. I have accordingly followed the old principle, as it is said, of the prætor Drusus, in the case of one who would not swear to observe the same conditions after he had obtained his liberty; I have not pronounced them free: especially as there was nobody present by whom their liberation could properly be asserted. You will receive this as you shall think fit. I assent to your judgment. To one most eloquent letter of yours I have not replied, in which you speak of the dangers of the republic. What should I reply? I was exceedingly disturbed. But the Parthians do nothing to occasion me much alarm, and have suddenly left Bibulus half alive.

LETTER III.

THE sixth of December I came to Herculaneum and there read your letter, which Philotimus delivered to me. The moment I saw it I had the satisfaction of recognising your own hand-writing; afterwards I was exceedingly delighted with the accurate information it contained. With respect to the first point, in which you say you differ from Diccærchus*, though I had earnestly requested (and that with your concurrence) that I might not be obliged to remain in the province longer than one year; yet this was not accomplished by our endeavours. For you must know that not a word was mentioned in the senate about any of us, who held provincial governments, remaining beyond the time appointed by the decree of the senate. So that I cannot justly be charged with any blame for having left the province earlier than might, perhaps, have been desirable. But what if it be better as it is? This has often appeared to be the case on other occasions as well as on this. For whether things can be brought to an agreement, or to the discomfiture of the evil-disposed, in either case I should be glad to give my assistance, or at least not to be out of the way. But if the good are overpowered, wherever I might be, I should be overpowered with them. Therefore, the quickness of my return ought not to be regretted. And if the idea of a triumph had not been thrown in my way, which you also approve, truly you should not now much want that character, which is drawn in my sixth book†. For what should I do to satisfy you, who have devoured those books? I should not even now hesitate to lay aside this object‡, great as it is, if it be more proper to do so. But it is impossible to pursue both at the same time, and while I serve my ambitious views in a triumph, to exert a free spirit in the cause of the republic. Do not, however, doubt, but that whichever is the more honourable, that will be to me the more desirable. For what you seem to recommend, that I should continue to hold my command, and remain out of the city*, both as being safer for myself, and as affording the means of rendering service to the republic, how this is we will consider when we meet. It is a thing that admits of deliberation, though in great measure I agree with you. You do well in not doubting of my affection towards the republic; and you judge rightly that he¶ has by no means acted liberally towards me, considering my services and his profusion to other people; and you justly explain the reason of this, which entirely agrees with what you say has been done in the case of Fabius and Caninius. But if this were not so, and he had devoted himself wholly to me, yet that guardian‡ divinity of the city which you mention would compel me to remember its noble inscription, and would not permit me to imitate Volcæus or Servius, with whom you are satisfied, but would call upon me to feel and to act as became me. And this I would readily do, if it might be done in a different manner from what is now required. For at this time people are contending for their own power, at the risk of the state. If it is in defence of the republic, why was it not defended at the time when this very man was consul? And the year following why was not I defended, with whose cause the safety of the republic was identified? Why was his command prolonged? or why in that manner? Why was such a struggle made that the ten tribunes of the people should propose the decree for his eligibility in his absence? By these means he is become so powerful, that now it is left to a single citizen to resist him; who I wish had never given him such power, instead of now opposing him, when he is so strong. But since affairs are brought to this situation, I shall not, as you say, "look out for the vessel of the Attribæ:" the only vessel for me shall be that which is steered by Pompeius. When you ask, what must be done if I am called upon—"Speak, M. Tullius, concisely." I assent to Cn. Pompeius. Yet privately I shall exhort Pompeius to peace. For I am convinced that affairs are in the greatest danger. You, who are in the city, know more. But this I see, that we have to do with a man of the boldest and readiest spirit; that all convicted, all disgraced persons, and all that deserve to be convicted and disgraced, incline to that party; almost all the youth, all the city rabble, the powerful tribunes, with the addition of C. Cassius; all who are oppressed with debt, whom I understand to be more than I had supposed. That cause wants nothing but a good cause; it has everything else in abundance. In such a state everybody ought to exert himself to prevent a decision by arms, the event of which is always uncertain, but in the present case rather to be dreaded in favour of one party*. Bibulus has left his province, and deputed the command on Veiento. He will not, as I hear, hurry himself in his departure. Cato, when he got him his honours, declared that the only persons towards whom he bore no jealousy were those whose influence could receive little or no increase. I come now to my private concerns; for I have mostly replied to your letter on the subject of the republic, and to that from your villa and to that which you wrote afterwards. I come to my private concerns. One word, also, about Cælius. He is so far from shaking my opinion, that I think he will himself repent of having changed his own. But how is it that Lucceius† buildings should have been adjudged to him? I am surprised that you should have omitted to mention it. About Philotimus I will do as you advise. I did not, however, expect from him at this time the accounts which he gave you; but the remainder which he desired me in Tusculanum to enter into my book with my own hand, and of which he also gave me a memorandum in Asia, written with his hand. If he made this good, he would himself owe me as much, or more, than what he there declares to be the amount of my debt. But hereafter, if only the condition of the republic permit, I will not subject myself to accusations of this kind: not, indeed, that I had before been negligent; but I was occupied with the multitude of my friends. I shall be glad, therefore, to avail myself of your assistance and advice, as you promise, and hope I shall not be giving you much trouble. Respecting those clogs^b of my cohort, there is no cause for uneasiness; for they corrected themselves on observing my integrity. But nobody vexed me more than one whom you least suspect. His behaviour was at first excellent, and is so now; but at the moment of my departure he intimated that he had hoped to receive something; and he did not restrain that covetousness which had gradually influenced his mind. But he soon recovered himself; and overcome by my honourable services towards him, he esteemed them of more value than any sum of money. I have received from Curius a will^c, which I carry with me. I have been informed of Hortensius's legacies^d. I now want to know what sort of a man the son^e is, and what it is that he intends to sell by auction. For if Cælius has got possession of the house at the Flumentan gate, I know not why I may not take for myself that at Puteoli. I come now to the word Pirææ, in which I am more reprehensible, that being a Roman, I should have written Pirææ^f, not Piræus (as all our people call it), than that I should have added the preposition into; for I have not considered it as the name of a town, but of a district^g. Yet our friend Dionysius, who is with me, and Nicias the Coan, did not think Pirææ to be a town. But I will see about it. My error, if it be one, consists in my having spoken of it not as a town, but as a district. And I have followed, I do not say Cælius, "In the morning when I went out of the port into Piræus;" for he is no authority for Latinity; but Terentius, whose comedies, on account of the elegance of their language, were supposed to be written by C. Lælius: "Yesterday, I and some other young men went together into Piræus." And again: "The merchant added this, that she had been taken out of Sunium." For if we choose to call districts towns, Sunium is as much a town as Piræus. But as you are a grammarian, if you can solve this question, you will relieve me from much embarrassment. Cæsar writes in a kind manner to me: Balbus does the same in his name. My resolution is, never to stir an inch from the path of honour.

^b Serperastra are described to be instruments for keeping straight the legs of children who are disposed to be crooked. The word may be adopted from Atticus, and applied to certain persons who had proved a clog and embarrassment to Cicero in his administration.

But you know how much remains due to him^h. Do you think, then, it is to be feared that anybody should object that debt to me, if I seem to act feebly? or that he should demand it, if I act firmly? What do you find in answer to this? Let us pay it, you say. Well, then, I will borrow from Cæliusⁱ. Yet I would have you consider this well; for I imagine if ever I should speak with energy in the senate in behalf of the republic, that Tartessian friend of yours^j will call to me as I go out, "Pray direct the money to be provided." Have I anything more to say? Yes, my son-in-law is agreeable to me, to Tullia, to Terentia. He has as much wit and kindness as you could wish. As to other things, to which you are no stranger, we must bear them. For you know about whom we inquired^k; who all, except him with whom I negotiated through you, think to make me responsible: for nobody will trust them. But of these matters when we meet; for they require a long talk. My hope of Tiro's recovery rests in M. Curius, to whom I have written that such service would be particularly acceptable to you. Dated the 9th of December, from Pontius's house at Tregulanum.

LETTER IV.

DIONYSIUS is impatient to see you. I have accordingly sent him, not with a very good grace; but there was no refusing it. I have found him learned, which I knew before; and besides, of correct behaviour, ready to oblige, studious of my reputation, careful, and (that I may not seem to be giving the character of a freed-man) in short an excellent man. I saw Pompeius the 10th of December. We were together perhaps two hours. He seemed to be much pleased at my arrival. He encouraged me in the affair of my triumph, and promised to do his part; advising me not to go to the senate till I should have finished this business, from fear of alienating any of the tribunes by the sentiments that might be delivered. In short, as far as words, nothing could be fuller of kindness. On the subject of the republic, he talked to me as if a war was inevitable. There appeared to be no hope of accommodation. His opinion of Cæsar's hostility had lately been confirmed by the arrival of Hirtius from Cæsar, with whom he was very intimate: for he had not called upon Pompeius; but having arrived on the evening of December 6th, and Balbus having engaged to go to Scipio before it was light upon this whole business, he returned late at night to Cæsar. This he considered as a plain sign of hostility. In short, nothing else affords me comfort, but that I cannot suppose he, to whom even his enemies had given a second consulate, to whom fortune had given the greatest power, would be so mad, as to bring these advantages to the hazard of a contest. But if he venture to rush on, I confess I am full of fears, which I dare not commit to paper. As things now are, I think of getting to Rome the 5th of January.

LETTER V.

I HAVE received several of your letters at the same time; and though I had later intelligence from people who came to meet me, yet they were very acceptable, as they showed your attention and kindness. I am concerned at your illness; and perceive that you suffer still greater uneasiness from Pilia's being attacked in a similar manner. Apply yourselves, both of you, to your recovery. I see the interest you take about Tiro. But, though he is of wonderful service to me, when he is well, in every species either of business or of study, yet I am more anxious for his recovery on account of his own kind and modest disposition, than for any advantage towards myself. Philogenes has never said anything to me about Luscienus. Dionysius will inform you of other matters. I am surprised that your sister should not have come to Arcanum¹. I am not sorry that you approve of my determination respecting Chrysippus². I have no intention of going to Tusculanum at this time. It is out of the way for those who might come to meet me, and has some other inconveniences. But I mean to proceed from Formianum to Terracina the 31st of December; thence to the extremity of the Pontine marsh; thence to Pompeius's villa at Albanum; and so to Rome the 3d of January, my birth-day. I daily become more alarmed about the republic. For even the good, as it is supposed, are not agreed. How many knights, how many senators have I seen, who severely blame, among other things, this journey of Pompeius! We have great need of peace. From a victory must arise many evils, and most assuredly that of a tyrant. But these things we shall very soon have an opportunity of discussing in person. There is now absolutely nothing that I can write about. Not about the republic, because our information is the same: and our domestic affairs are known to both. It only remains to joke, if this man³ permit. For my part I should think it wiser to grant him what he asks, than to meet in arms. It is too late now to resist one whom we have for ten years fostered against ourselves. What do you advise then? you will say. Nothing but with your concurrence; nor indeed anything before my business⁴ is either concluded, or laid aside. Take care then to get well; and shake off at length this ague with the diligence you so highly possess.

LETTER VI.

I HAVE absolutely nothing to say to you. You are acquainted with everything; nor have I anything to expect from you. Let me then only keep up my custom of not suffering anybody to go to you without a letter. I am in great fear about the republic; and have hitherto scarcely found anybody who did not think it better to grant Cæsar what he demanded, than to go to war. His demands are indeed greater than was supposed. But why should we now first resist him? For this is not a greater evil than when we prolonged his government for five years; or when we introduced the law permitting him to be a candidate for the consulship in his absence. Unless forsooth we then gave him these arms, that we might now fight with him well prepared. You will say, "What then will be your opinion?" Not what I shall say. For I shall think that everything ought to be done to avoid a battle; I shall say the same as Pompeius. Nor shall I do this with an abject spirit; but this again is a very great evil to the state, and in some measure peculiarly improper for me, that I should appear to differ from Pompeius in so important a cause.

LETTER VII.

"DIONYSIUS, an excellent man, as I have also found him, and very learned, and full of affection towards you, arrived in Rome the 18th of December, and delivered to me your letter." These are the very expressions contained in your letter about Dionysius. You do not add—"and he returns thanks to you." But he certainly ought: and such is your kindness that, if he had done so, you would have mentioned it. I do not however recant the testimony given of him in my former letter. Let him therefore be called an excellent man. For even this is well done, that he should have given me this means of thoroughly knowing him. Philogenes has informed you truly. He had provided what he ought⁵; and I desired him to make use of the money till it should be wanted. He has accordingly had the use of it thirteen months. I hope Pontinius is well; but from what you mention of his having entered the city, I am fearful what may be the matter⁶. For he would not have done so, but for some important reason. As the 2d of January is the day of the Compitalia⁷, I do not care to go to Albanum⁸ that day, from fear of being troublesome to the family; I shall therefore go on the third; and thence to the city on the fourth. I do not know on what day your fit recurs; but I should be sorry to have you disturbed under the inconvenience of your illness. Respecting the honour of my triumph, unless Cæsar employ any secret measures through his tribunes, everything else seems to be tranquil. Most tranquil certainly is my own mind, which looks upon the whole with indifference; and the more so, because I hear from many persons that Pompeius and his council have determined to send me into Sicily, as holding a command. This is worthy of Abdera⁹. For the senate has passed no decree, and the people no law, for my having a command in Sicily. But if the republic gives this authority to Pompeius, why should he send me, rather than any private person? If therefore this command is likely to give me trouble, I shall avail myself of the first gate I see¹⁰. For as to what you say of there being a wonderful expectation of my arrival, though at the same time none of the good, or moderately good, entertain any doubt of my sentiments: I do not understand whom you call good: for my own part I know none, at least if we look for whole orders of men, for undoubtedly there are individuals who are good. But in civil dissensions we ought to look for ranks and orders of good men. Do you think then the senate is good, which has left the provinces without commanders? For Curio could never have maintained his purpose^v if any attempt had been made to resist him. But the senate would not follow that advice; from whence it happened that no successor to Cæsar was appointed. Or the public renters! Who were never steady, but now are quite in Cæsar's interests. Or the bankers? Or farmers? Who have most reason to wish for peace; unless you suppose those people to be afraid of living under kingly government who have never objected to it, provided they could live in peace. What then? Must we admit the pretensions of one absent^w, who still keeps his army after the day appointed by law is past? I say at once, of nobody absent. For if this is granted, the other follows of course. Do we admit a government of ten years? and so ample? Then we must admit also my banishment, and the loss of the Campanian territory^x, and the adoption of a patrician^y by a plebeian, of a man of Cadiz^z by one of Mitylene; and we must admit the wealth of Labienus and Mamurra, and the gardens and Tusculan villa of Balbus. The source of all these is the same. He should have been resisted while he was weak, and the thing was easy. Now there are eleven legions, as many cavalry as he pleases, people beyond the Po, people from the city, so many tribunes of the people, such an abandoned body of young men, a leader of such authority, such boldness; this is the man with whom we must fight, or admit his pretensions, which are also sanctioned by the law. "Fight," you say, "rather than be a slave." For what object? That if you are conquered, you may be proscribed? If you conquer, that you may still be a slave? What then, say you, will you do? The same as cattle, which being scattered about follow the herds of their own species. As one ox follows the others, so shall I follow the good, or those who have the reputation of good, though they rush on to their destruction. I see clearly what is best^a in our sad straits. For nobody can say when we come to arms what will be the issue; but everybody knows that if the good are beaten, this man will neither be more sparing of the blood of the principal citizens, than Cinna was; nor more moderate than Sulla, in plundering the rich. I have been a long time talking politics with you, and should continue if my lamp were not going out. To be short,—“speak, Marcus Tullius,” I side with Pompeius: that is, with T. Pomponius. Pray make my compliments to that nice boy Alexis, unless perhaps in my absence he is become a young man,—for he seemed to be growing up very fast.

^v This Curio was a tribune, and creature of Cæsar, and therefore stopped the appointment of the new governors to secure Cæsar from a successor.

LETTER VIII.

WHAT need of such strong affirmation on the subject of Dionysius! Would not a mere nod from you secure my belief? But your silence gave me the greater suspicion, both because you generally employ your testimony to consolidate friendships, and I heard that he had spoken differently of me to other people. But I am perfectly satisfied that it is as you say. I therefore continue to regard him as you would have me. I had also marked the day of your agree from one of your letters written as the fit was coming on, and I calculated that you might, if there was occasion, come to me in Albanum without inconvenience the 3d of January. But pray do nothing that is inconsistent with your health. For what signifies one or two days? I understand that, by Livia's will, Dolabella with two co-heirs succeeds to a third part of her property, but on the condition of changing his name. It is a question of propriety whether it be right for a young man of noble birth to change his name for a lady's will. But we shall be able to determine this more philosophically, when we know to about how much this third of the third part of her property amounts. What you thought would be the case, that I should see Pompeius before I got to Rome, has accordingly happened. For on the 27th of December he came up to me at Lavernium. We came together to Formiæ, and conversed privately from two in the afternoon till dusk. In answer to your inquiry, if there is any hope of accommodation, so far as I have learned from Pompeius's full and accurate discourse, there is not even any inclination towards it. For his opinion is, that if Cæsar should be made consul, even with the dismissal of his army, the government will be overturned. He even thinks, that when he is acquainted with the active preparations against him, he will neglect the consulate this year, and prefer keeping his army and his province. But if he should be driven to madness, he held him in great contempt, and relied upon his own forces and those of the republic. In truth, though that saying often occurred to me, that the fortune of war was common; yet it was some alleviation of my solicitude, to hear a brave and experienced man, and one of the greatest authority, politically expose the dangers of a false peace. We had in our possession Antonius's speech pronounced the 23d of December, which contained an accusation of Pompeius from the time of his entering into public life, complaining of those who had been condemned, and of the terror of his arms. Upon which he observed, "What think you that Cæsar himself will do, if he should obtain the government of the state, when his weak and needy quæstor dares to utter such expressions?" In short, he appeared not only not to wish for such a peace, but even to dread it. Yet the apprehension of abandoning the city shakes, as I conceive, this resolution^b. It is a great vexation to me, that I must pay off my debt to Cæsar, and transfer to that quarter the materials of my triumph. For it is unseemly to be indebted to one of an opposite party. But of this, and many other things, when we meet.

^b The text is obscure, and perhaps faulty.

LETTER IX.

"AM I," say you, "to receive a letter from you every day?" Yes, if I find anybody to whom I can give it. "But you are on the point of being here yourself." It will then be time enough to stop when I arrive. I find there is one of your letters which has never reached me, owing to my friend L. Quintius, who was bringing it, being robbed and wounded at Basilus's monument. Consider therefore, if it contained anything of importance for me to know. At the same time resolve me this political problem. Since one of these things must take place: either 1st, that Cæsar should be deemed eligible, while he still retains his army through the senate, or through the tribunes of the people; or 2dly, that Cæsar must be persuaded to give up his province and his army, in order to become consul; or 3dly, if this cannot be done, that the comitia may be held without any consideration of him, yet with his suffering it, and retaining his province; or, 4thly, if through the interference of the tribunes he does not suffer the comitia to proceed, but yet remains quiet, that the business may be brought to an interregnum; or, 5thly, if in order to enforce his claims, he should bring up his army, that we must then contend in arms; and 6thly, that he may either begin the contest immediately, before we are sufficiently prepared; or, 7thly, after his friends have preferred at the comitia their request for his eligibility, and have been refused; he may also, 8thly, proceed to arms either for that single reason, that his claims are not admitted; or 9thly, for an additional reason if it happen that any tribune, in his attempt to interrupt the senate, or to excite the populace, should be marked or circumvented by a decree of the senate, or removed, or expelled, or should flee to him under pretence of being expelled: again, when war is actually begun, we must either, 10thly, remain in possession of the city,—or 11thly, we must leave it, in order to intercept his supplies of provisions and troops. Tell methen of these evils, to one of which we must certainly submit, which you think the least. You will say, "that he should be persuaded to deliver up his army in order to be made consul." It is indeed a measure of such a kind, that if he consents nothing can be said against it; and if he does not obtain the admission of his claims, I shall be surprised if he does not do it. Yet there are some persons who think nothing is more to be dreaded than that he should be consul. "But so," you will say, "is better than with his army." Certainly. But this very so may well make one exclaim, O what a great calamity! and it admits of no remedy; we must submit at his discretion. Think of him a second time consul, whom you remember in his former consulate. At that time, in his weakness, he out-matched, you say, the whole republic; what do you expect now? And when he is consul, Pompeius is resolved to be in Spain. This is a sad state, that the very thing which is most to be deprecated, cannot be refused; and if he does it, he will presently attain the highest favour amongst all good men. But setting aside this, to which they say he can never be brought, of the remaining evils which is the worst? To yield to what Pompeius calls his most impudent demands? For Pompeius to be more impudent? You have held the province for ten years, granted you not by the senate, but by yourself, through violence and faction. The period has elapsed, not of the law, but of your self-will; but suppose it to be of the law, a decree is passed for appointing a successor, you stop it, and say, "Have consideration for me." Have you for us? Would you keep your army longer than the people granted it? and against the will of the senate? "You must fight then, unless you agree to it." With a good hope, as Pompeius says, either of conquering or of dying in liberty. If now we must fight, the time depends upon accidents; the manner, on future events: on this subject therefore I do not call upon you. If you have anything to offer in reply to what I have said, let me hear it. I am tortured with anxiety day and night.

LETTER X.

I HAVE suddenly come to the resolution of setting out before light, to avoid observation and discourse, especially as my lictors come with their laurels^c. For the rest, truly I neither know what I am doing, or what I shall do; so much am I disturbed with the rash determination^d of our general, who seems to have lost his senses. How can I advise you, who am myself waiting for your advice? What has been Cæsar's object, or what is now his object, I cannot tell, cramped as he is within the towns, and appearing stupified. If he remains in Italy, we shall all be together: but if he retires, our conduct must be a subject of consideration. Hitherto certainly, if I have any understanding, everything has been done foolishly and incautiously. Pray write to me very often, whatever comes into your mind.

LETTER XI.

WHAT, I beseech you, is all this? or what are people about? For I am quite in the dark. "We have got possession," you say, "of Cingulum; we have lost Anconis; Labienus has deserted from Cæsar." Are we speaking of a Roman general, or of Hannibal? O wretched man, and void of understanding^e, who has never known even a shadow of what is truly honourable! Yet he professes to do all this for honour's sake. But how can there be honour, where there is not rectitude? Or is it right then to have an army without any public appointment? To occupy the towns of Roman citizens, in order to get a readier access to his own country? To cancel debts, to recall exiles, to institute six hundred other wicked practices, "in order to obtain (as Eteocles says)^f the greatest kingdom of the gods?" I envy him not his fortune. I would assuredly prefer a single basking^g with you in your Lucretine sun, before all kingdoms of such a kind; or rather I would die a thousand times, before I would suffer such a thought to enter my mind. "What if you should wish it."

^c The fasces borne by the lictors, or serjeants, attending one who had been saluted emperor, were bound with laurel till they entered the city. See book v. letter 20.

you say? "For everybody is at liberty to wish." But I consider this very wish a thing more wretched than being crucified. The only thing that is worse, is to get what you so wish. But enough of this; for I am too ready to dwell upon these troubles with you: let us return to our own general. Tell me then, what think you of this resolution of Pompeius? I mean his leaving the city. I am quite at a loss: nothing seems more absurd. That you should leave the city? Would you then do the same if the Gauls should come^b? The republic, he says, does not consist in its walls, but in all that we hold dear. Themistocles did the same^c. For a single city was unable to withstand the united flood of foreign nations. But Pericles did not so, fifty years afterwards, when besides the walls he kept nothing. And our own people formerly, when the rest of the city was captured, still kept possession of the citadel: "so have we heard the deeds of ancient heroes." Yet by the grief of the towns, and the conversation of those I meet, this resolution seems likely to produce some effect. There is a wonderful complaint (I know not if it is made there; but you will tell me) that the city should be without magistrates, without a senate. In short, Pompeius by his flight creates a strong sensation. What think you? The case is quite altered, and now it is thought that nothing should be granted to Cæsar. Explain to me how all this is. I have a charge attended with little trouble: for Pompeius wishes me to have the superintendence of all this district of Campania, and the sea-coast; so that the levies of troops, and all business of importance, may be referred to me. I therefore expect to be unsettled. I imagine by this time you see what is Cæsar's impetuosity, what is the disposition of the people, what is the state of the whole business: about all these things I should be glad if you would write to me, and (as they are liable to change) as often as you can. For I feel some comfort both whilst I am writing to you, and whilst I am reading your letters.

LETTER XII.

I HAVE hitherto received but one letter from you, dated the 20th^d, in which it is mentioned that you had previously despatched another, which I have not received. But I beg you will write as often as possible, not only if you have learned, or heard anything, but even if you suspect it; especially what you think I ought or ought not to do. As to what you ask me, that I should take care to inform you what Pompeius is doing; I do not believe he knows himself, and certainly nobody else does. I saw the consul Lentulus at Formiæ the 22d, and saw Libo. Everything is full of alarm and confusion. Pompeius is gone to Larinum; for there the troops are, and at Luceria, and Theanum, and other parts of Apulia. Thence it is uncertain whether he means to stop anywhere, or to cross the sea. If he remains, I doubt whether he can rely upon his army; if he goes away, what I should do, whither I should go, or where I should stay, I know not. For I apprehend he, whose tyranny you dread, will act most sadly. Neither the adjournment of public business, nor the flight^d of the senate and magistrates, nor the secret^e treasury, will stop him. But this, as you say, we shall soon see. In the mean time you must excuse me for writing to you so much, and so often. For I feel some consolation from it, and besides am desirous of eliciting your letters in return, especially your advice, what I should do, or how I should conduct myself, and whether I should give myself up wholly to the party. I am not deterred by danger; but am distracted with grief. That everything should be conducted with such want of judgment, or so contrary to my own judgment! Or should I hesitate, and turn back, and join those who are in possession, and enjoy the smiles of fortune? "I have too much respect for the Trojans!" and am prevented by the duty not only of a citizen, but of a friend. But then I am unmannered by commiseration for the children. Write therefore something to me in my trouble, notwithstanding you feel the same distress; but especially if Pompeius should retire out of Italy, tell me what you think I ought to do. Manius Lepidus indeed (for we were together) has resolved to go no further than that; L. Torquatus says the same. I have many circumstances, and among the rest my lictors, to embarrass me. I never met with anything less capable of being disentangled. Therefore I ask for nothing certain, but only for what you think; and, in short, I wish to know your very doubting. It is pretty certain that Labienus has left Cæsar. If it had happened that on coming to Rome he could have found the magistrates and the senate there, it might have been of great service to our cause; as by it he would appear to pass sentence upon a friend for the sake of the republic. This appears indeed now, but is of less service; for there is nobody to serve; and I imagine he already repents of the step he has taken; unless perhaps the very circumstance of his having left him be false: I had it however for a truth. Now though, as you say, you confine yourself within your own boundaries, yet I wish you to explain to me the actual state of the city; whether there is expressed any wish for Pompeius; any dislike towards Cæsar; also what you think about Terentia and Tullia, whether they should continue at Rome, or be with me, or retire to some place of safety. All this, and anything else that occurs, I should be glad to hear from you, and the oftener the better.

LETTER XIII.

I AGREE with you about the Vennonian business. I look upon Labienus as a hero. There has been for a long time no deed more distinguished amongst our citizens. If no other good arise from it, there is this at least, that it has given pain to Cæsar. But I think moreover that it has some effect in advancing the general cause. I love Piso too, whose judgment of his son-in-law^f must, I think, have weight. Though you see the nature of this contest. It is a civil war of such a kind, as does not arise from divisions among the members of the state, but from the audacity of one abandoned citizen. He is powerful from his army; he retains many by hopes and promises; but really aims at possessing everything belonging to everybody. To this man has the city been delivered up, full of supplies, and without a garrison. What is there that you may not dread from one who regards those temples and houses not as his country, but as his prey? What he designs to do however, or by what means, I know not, without a senate, and without magistrates: he cannot so much as pretend to any public motive. But where shall we be able to raise ourselves up again? or when? having, as you must perceive, a most ungengal-like commander, who did not even know the circumstances of Picenum^a. How unadvised he is, the state of affairs testifies; for, to say nothing of the errors of the last ten years, what condition is not preferable to this flight? Nor do I now understand what are his intentions; and I do not cease in my letters to inquire. It is plain that nothing can be more timid, nothing more confused: so that I see no protection, for the sake of which he was kept near the city; nor any place or situation for protection. All hope is placed in two legions that are invisciously retained^b, and ill-affected. For the new recruits are hitherto raised against their inclination, and determined not to fight. The time for making conditions is lost. What is likely to happen I do not see. It has been committed by us, or at least by our leader, to go out of harbour without our rudders, and give ourselves up to the storm. I am in doubt what I should do with our young Ciceros: I have sometimes thought of sending them into Greece. And with respect to Tullia and Terentia, when the approach of so many foreign troops comes across my mind, I dread everything: then again when I recollect Dolabella, I a little revive. I should wish you to consider what you think I ought to do; in the first place, for security; (for a different consideration is due to them and to myself); then for my reputation, that I may not be blamed for choosing to let them be in Rome at a time when all honest people are leaving it. You also, and Peducens, who has written to me, must take care what you do; for such is your reputation, that as much is required of you as of the greatest citizens. But about this you will see; as I wish you to consider about myself, and my concerns. It remains for me to beg that you will find out, as well as you are able, what is doing, and will write me word: also what you can ascertain by conjecture, which I particularly look for from you. For, while everybody relates what is done, from you I expect what is going to be done. "The best prophet is one who guesses well". Pardon my loquaciousness; which both affords me some relief while I am writing to you, and calls forth your letters^c.

I could not at first understand the enigma of the Oppii of Velia^d; for it is more obscure than Plato's doctrine of numbers^e. But I now understand your meaning; for you call the Oppii the Juices^f of Velia. This puzzled me a long time. But this being made out, the rest was clear, and agreed with Terentia's account. I saw L. Cæsar at Minturnæ the morning of the 25th of January with most extravagant instructions; a mere mass of straw; so that he seems to me to have done it in mockery, to deliver to him instructions of such importance. Unless perhaps he did not deliver them, and this man caught hold of some expressions, which he pretended were instructions. Labienus, whom I look upon as a great man, came to Theanum the 23d; there he met Pompeius and the consuls. When I know certainly what was said and done, I will inform you. Pompeius went from Theanum towards Larinum the 24th. That day he remained at Venafrum. Labienus seems to have brought us a little encouragement. But I have nothing yet to tell you from this quarter. I rather wait to hear what news is brought thither; how he bears this conduct of Labienus; what Domitius is doing among the Marsi, or Thermanus at Iguvium, or P. Attius at Cingulum^g; how the people in the city are disposed; and what is your opinion of the future. Upon these subjects I should wish often to hear from you, and what you think best to be done about the ladies, and what you mean to do yourself. If I were writing with my own hand, I should send you a longer letter: but I employ an amanuensis on account of a weakness in my eyes.

LETTER XIV.

I SEND this on the 27th of January, on my way from Cales to Capua, having still a slight inflammation of the eyes. L. Cæsar delivered Cæsar's despatch to Pompeius on the 25th, while he was with the consuls at Theanum. The terms were approved, with this reserve, that he should withdraw his garrisons from those places which he had occupied beyond the limits of his province. If he did this, it was replied that we would return to the city, and conclude the business through the senate. I hope that we are at peace even at this present. For he begins to repent of his madness, and our general of his forces^h. Pompeius wished me to go to Capua, and to forward the levies; in which the Campanian settlers are not very ready to engage. Pompeius has very conveniently distributed Cæsar's gladiators, which are at Capua, and about whom I had before sent you a wrong account from Torquatus's letters. Two are sent to each family. There were 500 of them in the schools. It was said they were going to make an insurrection: so that in this respect the republic has been well provided in that part of Rome known by the name of Velia.

^a This doctrine of numbers was derived from Pythagoras, and is indeed most obscure. Plato has introduced it in his "Timæus," and in some other parts of his works.

^b I have thought it best to give this, which I conceive to be the meaning of the Latin succones, derived from succus, "succus," or "juice." There is an instance of a similar enigma on the name of Philotimus. [See book vi. letter 3.] Of the Oppii see book viii. letter 7, note ^m.

^c These were all of them of Pompeius's party.

^d Pompeius begins to repent of having placed his reliance on such doubtful troops.

^a That the town of Picenum should have been garrisoned to prevent the approach of Cæsar to Rome.

^b They had been raised for the Parthian war.

^c The original is quoted from Euripides.

^d There is every appearance of this being the conclusion of one letter, and what follows, the beginning of another.

^e The Oppii were probably scribes and money agents vided for. Respecting our ladies, amongst whom is your sister, pray consider how far it is reputable for us that they should remain at Rome, when all other ladies of any respect have left it. I have before written to you, and have written to them about it. I should wish you to encourage their departure; especially as I have estates on the seacoast, where I preside, in which they may be accommodated as occasion offers. For if offence is taken at my conduct, it arises from my son-in-law; for which I ought not to be responsible: but this is something more, that our ladies should have continued at Rome after all the others. I should be glad to know what you yourself, and Sextus, think about going away; and what is your opinion of the whole state of affairs. For my own part, I do not cease to recommend peace; which, even if it be unequitable, is preferable to the most equitable war. But this as fortune shall ordain.

LETTER XV.

SINCE my departure from the city, I have suffered no day to pass without writing something to you; not that I had much to say, but that I might talk with you in my absence. For, when I cannot do this in person, nothing is more agreeable to me. Upon my arrival at Capua on the 27th, the day previous to my writing this, I met the consuls and many of our order^x; all of whom wished that Cæsar might withdraw his garrisons, and abide by the terms he had offered. Favonius alone objected to our admitting any conditions imposed by him; but he was not attended to in the council. Even Cato thinks it now better to submit than to fight. He says however that he wishes to be present in the senate, when the terms are debated, if Cæsar should be induced to withdraw his garrisons. Therefore he does not care to go into Sicily, where his presence is greatly wanted; but is desirous of being in the senate, which I fear may be prejudicial. Postumus also, whom the senate appointed by name to go immediately into Sicily to succeed Fuffenus, refuses to go without Cato, and conceives that his own assistance and weight in the senate is of great importance. Thus the business devolves upon Fannius, who is sent before with a command into Sicily. There is a great difference of opinion in our consultations. Most think that Cæsar will not adhere to the conditions, and that these requisitions were interposed by him only to interrupt our necessary preparations for war. But I expect that he will withdraw his garrisons: for if he is made consul, he will gain his purpose, and will gain it with less guilt than that with which he began. But a severe blow must be sustained; for we are shamefully unprepared both in men and money. The whole of which, whether belonging to individuals in the city, or to the public in the treasury, is left for him. Pompeius is gone to join the troops of Attius, and has taken Labienus with him. I want your opinion upon these matters. I design to retire immediately to Formiæ.

^x Of the senators.

LETTER XVI.

I IMAGINE I have received all your letters; the first irregularly, the rest in the order in which Terentia sent them. About Cæsar's proposals, and Labienus's arrival, and the replies of the consuls and of Pompeius, I have written to you in a letter from Capua of the 28th, and have besides thrown together several things in the same letter. We have now two subjects of expectation; one, what Cæsar will determine when he has received the answer delivered to L. Cæsar; the other, what Pompeius is doing, who sends me word that in a few days he shall have an army on which he can depend; and he holds out the hope that, if he gets into the country of Picenum, we may return again to Rome. He has with him Labienus, who speaks confidently of the weakness of Cæsar's forces. His arrival is a great source of encouragement to our Cnæus. I have been desired by the consuls to be at Capua the 5th of February. I set out from Capua to go to Formiæ the 30th of January; and the same day having received your letter at Cales about three in the afternoon, I have immediately set down to answer it. I agree with you about Terentia and Tullia, to whom I had written referring them to you. If they are not already set out, there is no occasion for their removing till we see what the situation of things may be.

LETTER XVII.

YOUR letter is most acceptable and agreeable to me. I thought of transporting the boys into Greece, at a time when the quitting Italy seemed necessary: for if I should go to Spain this would not be equally suitable for them. I think you and Sextus may even now very well remain in Rome; for you have no reason to be friends with our Pompeius,—since nobody ever withdrew so much from the city garrison. You see that I can still joke^x with you. You must already be acquainted with the answer which L. Cæsar brings back from Pompeius, and the letter he bears from him to Cæsar; for it is written and delivered with the view of being made public. I have in my own mind found fault with Pompeius, who, though he writes so well, should have left to Sestius an affair of such consequence, which was to go into everybody's hands. Accordingly, I never read anything more Sestian^y. It may, however, be seen by Pompeius's letter, that nothing is refused to Cæsar; but everything that he can demand is abundantly granted,—which he must be mad if he does not accept, especially as the demand is most unreasonable: for who are you that say, "if Pompeius goes into Spain," and "if he dismisses his garrisons?" Yet this is granted; though not so honourably now, when the republic has been violated and invaded by arms, as if he had formerly obtained the acknowledgment of his eligibility. Yet I doubt if even this will satisfy him. For when he had delivered his proposals to L. Cæsar, he should have waited more quietly for the answer; instead of which he is reported to be particularly active. Trebatius sends me word, that he was desired by Cæsar to write to me the 22d of January, requesting me to come to Rome, and saying that I could not do him a greater favour. Upon all this he largely dilated. I understood, by reckoning up the days, that as soon as Cæsar had heard of my departure he began to be uneasy, from the apprehension that we^a might all be absent. I do not doubt, therefore, of his having written likewise to Piso, and to Servius. I am rather surprised that he should not have written to me himself, or should not have applied to me through Dolabella or Cælius; not that I have any objection to Trebatius's writing, of whose affection I am well persuaded. I wrote word back to Trebatius (for I did not care to write to Cæsar, as he had not written to me), that it could not very well be done at this time,—but that I was at one of my farms, and had taken no part in raising troops or any other business: and I intend to maintain this posture as long as any hope remains. But if war breaks out, I shall not be wanting to my duty or to my dignity, having first sent the boys into Greece. For I perceive that every part of Italy will be involved in the contest,—so great is the mischief excited partly by wicked, partly by jealous citizens. But in a few days it will be understood, from the manner in which he receives our answer, how things are likely to go. Then, if we are to have war, I will write to you more at length; but if even a truce is agreed upon, I shall hope to see you myself. This 2d of February, on which day I write in Formianum, being just returned from Capua, I am expecting the ladies, though I had written to them by your advice to desire they would remain in Rome; but I hear there has been a great alarm in the city. I mean to be at Capua the 5th of February, as the consuls desired. Whatever intelligence is brought hither from Pompeius I will immediately write to inform you; and I shall expect to hear from you upon these affairs.

^x The joke consists in giving the name of garrison to the senators and others who quitted Rome.

LETTER XVIII.

ON the 2d of February the ladies arrived at Formiæ, and brought an account of your attention and great kindness to them. I have thought it best that they should remain in Formianum along with the young Ciceros, till I knew whether we were to have a disgraceful peace or a wretched war. I am going with my brother to the consuls at Capua the 3d of February, on which day I write; for we were desired to be there the 5th. Pompeius's answer is said to be liked by the people, and approved by the assembly. I had supposed it would be so. If he^a rejects this, he will lose his estimation; if he accepts it,—^b “Which then,” you will say, “do you prefer?” I would answer you if I knew how well we were prepared. It was reported here that Cassius had been driven from Ancon, and that the place was in the possession of our people. If a war takes place, this may be an advantageous circumstance. They say that Cæsar, at the very time when Lucius Cæsar was sent with proposals of peace, was nevertheless eagerly raising recruits, occupying different posts, and securing himself with garrisons. O the wicked robber! O disgrace to the republic, scarcely to be compensated by any peace. But let us cease to complain, and bend to the times, and go with Pompeius into Spain. This is what I wish for in this sad state, since we have, without any pretence, refused to let the republic see him a second time consul^c. But enough of this. I forgot before to write to you about Dionysius; but it was my determination to wait for Cæsar's answer,—that in case I should return to the city he might wait for me there, or if that should be put off then I might send for him. I say nothing of what he ought to do in the event of my flight, or what becomes a learned and friendly man, especially when he had been asked. But this I must not require too rigidly from Greeks. You will take care, however, if it is necessary to summon him (which I should be sorry for) that I may not trouble him against his inclination. My brother Quintus is anxious to pay what he owes you through Egnatius; and there is no want of inclination on Egnatius's part, nor any want of funds: but the times being such that Q. Titinius, who has been a great deal with me, has not enough to defray his expenses on the road, and has informed his debtors that they must continue the same interest^d; that L. Ligus also is said to have done the same; and that Quintus has at present so money in his house, and can neither get any from Egnatius nor borrow anywhere: he is surprised that you should have no regard for this general embarrassment. And I, whilst I observe that precept falsely attributed to Hesiod (for so it is supposed), to pronounce no judgment till you have heard both sides, especially against you, whom I never knew to do anything unadvisedly; yet I am moved by his complaint: at all events I wished you to be acquainted with it.

^a The senators.

^c I have left this break as it is in the original. The sense no doubt is, that if Cæsar agrees to Pompeius's terms, we shall be left in a very bad condition.

LETTER XIX.

I HAVE nothing to tell you: nay, a letter which I had written I have not sent,—for it was full of good hopes; as I had been informed of the disposition of the assembly, and imagined that Cæsar would abide by the terms, especially as they were his own. Behold then on the morning of the 4th of February I received your letter, and that of Philotimus, of Furnius, and of Curio to Furnius, in which he ridicules L. Cæsar's embassy. I feel quite overwhelmed, and know not what resolution to form. Yet it is not for myself that I care; but I am at a loss what to do about the boys. I write this, however, on my way to Capua, that I may more readily learn the state of Pompeius's affairs.

LETTER XX.

THE time itself makes me little disposed to say much; for I despair of peace, and our friends make no provision for war. You can imagine anything weaker than these consuls; by whose directions I came to Capua yesterday in a violent aim, with the hope of hearing what they had to propose, and of learning the state of our preparations. They had not then arrived, but were coming empty and unprepared. Cnæus was said to be at Luceria, where he was to join some cohorts of the Attian legion, not very steady. But Cæsar, they say, is rushing on and almost at hand; not with the view of fighting,—for with whom should he fight! but to intercept our flight. For myself, I am ready to die with the rest in Italy; about which I do not consult you. But if they go out of Italy what should I do? The winter, the lictors which attend me*, the improvidence and negligence of our leaders, all tend to make me stay: the motives to flight are, my friendship with Cnæus, the common cause of all honest men, the baseness of joining with a tyrant, who whether he will imitate Phalaris, or Pisistratus†, is uncertain. I should be glad if you could resolve these difficulties, and assist me with your counsel,—though I imagine you must yourself be already in perplexity where you are,—but yet as far as you may be able. If I learn anything new here to-day, you shall know it; or the consuls will presently be here, as they appointed. I hope to hear from you every day. You will answer this as soon as you can. I left the ladies and the young Ciceros in Formianum.

^c Cæsar's eligibility having been sanctioned by law, there was no longer any pretence to oppose it.

^d It was usual to pay the interest of money the middle of every month, and probably some intimation was given in case the interest was to continue unaltered.

LETTER XXI.

Of our calamities you have earlier intelligence than I, for they take their course from thence; and there is nothing good to be expected from hence. I came to Capua the 5th of February, agreeably to the order of the consuls. Lentulus arrived late in the day; the other consul had not yet arrived on the 7th: for on that day I left Capua and staid at Cales, from whence I send this the following day before it is light. I learned so much at Capua,—that the consuls are quite inefficient, and that no troops are raised. Those employed on the recruiting service dare not show their faces, as Cæsar is at hand; while our commander is nowhere, and does nothing; so that the people will not enlist,—not from want of inclination, but from want of encouragement. But our Cnæus (O wretched and incredible state!), how is he quite sunk! He has no spirit, no counsel, no forces, no exertion; to say nothing of his shameful flight from the city, his timid harangues in the towns, his ignorance not only of his adversary's forces, but of his own. What is the meaning of this? On the 7th of February, C. Cassius, tribune of the people, came to Capua with instructions from Pompeius to the consuls that they should go to Rome and take away the money from the sacred treasury‡, and immediately quit the city. Return to Rome? under what guard? Then that they should go out again? with whose permission? The consul wrote word back, that Pompeius himself must first occupy Picenum^b. But that was already lost; which I knew, and nobody else, from Dolabella's letters. I had no doubt but that Cæsar would presently be in Apulia, and that our Cnæus would be on board a ship. It is a great question what I should do. I should have no difficulty, if everything had not been conducted most disgracefully, while I was never consulted. But yet I would do what becomes me. Cæsar himself invites me to peace; but his letter is previous to his present impetuous career. Dolabella and Cælius assure me that my conduct is satisfactory to him. I am distracted with wonderful irresolution. Help me, if you can, with your advice; and at the same time, as far as you are able, provide for what may happen. In such a confused state of affairs I can write about nothing. I am expecting to hear from you.

LETTER XXII.

I PERCEIVE there is not a foot of ground in Italy that is not in Cæsar's power. Of Pompeius I know nothing; and unless he gets on board a ship, I fear he will be taken. What incredible speed! But as for this our general.—Yet I cannot without pain find fault with one for whom I am grieved and distressed. It is not without reason that you apprehend a slaughter; not that anything could be less calculated to secure the victory and authority of Cæsar; but I see by whose counsels he will act. May it turn out well! I apprehend it will be necessary to retire from these towns. I am at a loss what steps to take. You will do what you think best. Speak with Philotimus; and you will have Terentia on the 13th. What should I do? In what land, or what sea, should I follow him, whom I know not where to find? But how is it possible by land? And in what sea? Shall I then deliver myself up to Cæsar? Suppose I could do it with safety (and many people advise it), could I also do it with honour? Certainly not. What then? I want your advice, as usual. It is a difficulty which cannot be cleared up: yet tell me what occurs to you, and what you mean to do yourself.

LETTER XXIII.

On the 9th of February in the evening I received a letter from Philotimus informing me that Domitius had an army to be depended upon; and that it had been joined by the troops from Picenum under the conduct of Lentulus and Thermus; that Cæsar might be intercepted, and that he was afraid of it: that the spirits of honest men in Rome were raised; that the wicked were almost thunderstruck. I am afraid that this is but a dream: but, however, Philotimus's letter has quite revived M. Lepidus, L. Torquatus, and C. Cassius the tribune of the people, who are with me in the neighbourhood of Formiæ^c. I wish it may not be more true, that we are all nearly prisoners; and that Pompeius is retiring from Italy; of whom (O bitter chance!) Cæsar is said to be in pursuit. Cæsar in pursuit of Pompeius? What? to kill him? O sad! And do we not all make a rampart of our bodies to oppose him? In this you also take an interest. But what can we do? We are completely conquered, overwhelmed, and taken. However, upon reading Philotimus's letter I have changed my resolution about the ladies, whom, as I told you, I was going to send back to Rome. But it occurred to me that it might occasion a good deal of talk, if I should seem already to have formed my judgment of the public cause: in despair of which the ladies went back as a step to my own return. Respecting myself, I agree with you, that I should not expose myself to a doubtful and hazardous flight, by which I can do no good to the republic, none to Pompeius, for whom I am willing to die with all devotion and readiness. I will therefore remain: though to live—J. You ask what people are doing here. All Capua, and all recruiting, is sunk in despair: the cause is considered as lost; everybody is running away; unless there be any prospect of Pompeius uniting those troops of Domitius with his own. But I suppose we shall know everything in two or three days. I have sent you a copy of Cæsar's letter, as you desired. Many persons have assured me of his being very well pleased with the part I have taken. I am not sorry for this; whilst I shall continue, as I have hitherto done, to avoid anything inconsistent with my honour.

LETTER XXIV.

PHILOTIMUS's letter gave wonderful encouragement, not to me, but to those who were with me. The next day comes a letter to Cassius from his friend Lucretius at Capua, saying that Nigidius had arrived at Capua from Domitius, and reported that Vibullius was fleeing out of Picenum with a few soldiers to Cnæus, and that Cæsar was immediately following him, while Domitius could not muster 3000 men. He added that the consuls had left Capua. I doubt not but Cnæus is trying to make his escape, if only he can effect it. I have, as you advise, no thought of fleeing away.

LETTER XXV.

AFTER I had despatched my letter to you full of sad news, but I fear too true, on the subject of Lucretius's letter to Cassius from Capua; Cephalio arrived, and brought from you a more cheerful letter, yet not written with your usual confidence. I can believe anything sooner than what you say, that Pompeius is at the head of an army. Nobody brings any intelligence of the kind hither, but

J I understand this to allude to his destroying himself, if he could not live with credit, like what is repeatedly said, book iii. letters 9, 19, 23, under the affliction of his banishment; and there also it is rather implied than expressed, probably to avoid the ill omen of an open declaration in direct terms.

everything that is unpleasant. It is a wretched state. He has always been successful in a bad cause: in the best of causes he has failed. What can be said, but that he understood the one, which was easy enough, and did not understand the other? For the right administration of the republic is a difficult art. But I shall very soon know everything, and will immediately write to you.

LETTER XXVI.

I CANNOT say, as you do, "how often do I revive?" For it is only now that I a little revive, especially by the intelligence that is brought from Rome about Domitius, and the troops of the Picentians. These last two days everything has become more favourable, so that the preparations for flight are put off. Cæsar's declaration, "if I find you here two days hence^k," is discredited. The accounts of Domitius are good; those of Afranius excellent. Your friendly advice of keeping myself free from either party as long as I can, is very agreeable to me. When you add, that I must avoid the appearance of being inclined to a bad cause, I certainly may appear so; for I refused to take a lead in the civil contest while peace was in agitation: not that it was not right, but because that which was much more right had brought upon me the imputation of wrong^l. I certainly did not wish to make an enemy of him^m to whom Pompeius would offer a second consulate and a triumph: and in what terms? "for his most distinguished conduct." I know whom I should fear, and why. But if a war breaks out, as I see it will, I shall not be backward in taking my side. Terentia has written to you about the 20,000 sesterii (166*l.*). While I thought I should be moving about, I did not care to be troublesome to Dionysius; and I made no reply to your repeated assurance of his attachment, because I expected from day to day to be able to determine what was to be done. Now, as far as I see, the boys are likely to pass the winter in Formianum. Whether I shall be there too, I do not know; for if we go to war, I am resolved to join Pompeius. When I hear anything certain, I will take care to inform you. For my part I apprehend the foulest war; unless, as you know, some accident should occur on the side of Parthiaⁿ.

^k This is not to be supposed Cæsar's actual declaration. It appears to be a line out of some poem, and probably means no more than to express the apprehensions entertained of Cæsar's unlimited power.

^l This alludes to the persecution and banishment which he suffered in consequence of his exertions in suppressing the Catilinarian conspiracy.

ⁿ The Romans having sustained a signal defeat by the Parthians, at the time of Crassus's death, became peculiarly alive to any danger that might arrive, and had already appointed Pompeius to go thither, [book vi. letter i.] from whence it was hoped, that, in case of alarm from that quarter, the necessity of his absence might prevent a civil war from breaking out.

BOOK VIII.

LETTER I.

PRESENTLY after I had sent my letter to you, I received one from Pompeius. It mostly related to the transactions in Picenum, of which Vibullius had sent him an account; and to the troops raised by Domitius; all which is known to you. It did not, however, represent things in so favourable a light as Philotimus's letter. I would have sent you the letter itself, but that my brother's servant is in a hurry to set off. I will send it therefore to-morrow*. But at the end of the letter is added in Pompeius's own hand: "I think you should come to Luceria: you can nowhere be safer." I understood this to signify, that he looked upon these towns, and maritime coast[†], as given up. And I was not surprised that he, who had given up the head[‡] itself, should not spare the other members. I immediately wrote him word back by a confidential attendant, that I did not consider where I could be most in safety; but that if he wished me to go to Luceria on his own account, or that of the republic, I would immediately go: and I advised him to preserve the sea-coast, if he hoped to be supplied with grain from the provinces. I knew that I was saying this to no purpose; but as in the case of retaining the city formerly, so now in the case of not relinquishing Italy, I wished to declare my opinion. For I perceive that preparations are making to concentrate all the troops at Luceria, not because that place is tenable, but that from thence, if we are pressed, we may have a ready escape. You must not therefore be surprised, if I am unwilling to embark in a cause which has for its object neither peace nor victory, but only a disgraceful and calamitous flight. I must go; that, whatever issue chance may produce, I may rather submit to it with those who are called good than appear to dissent from the good. Though I see that the city will presently be full of good people in one sense, that is, of the luxurious and wealthy; and if these distant towns are deserted, it will overflow. I should be among their number, if I were not encumbered with these lictors. Nor should I be sorry to have Manius Lepidus, L. Volcatius, and Sergius Sulpitius, for my companions; of whom none exceeds L. Domitius in folly, or Appius Claudius in inconstancy. Pompeius alone affects me, not by his authority, but by his kindness. For what authority can he have in this cause? who professed his fondness for Cæsar at a time when we were all afraid of him; and since he is become afraid himself, thinks that everybody ought to be Cæsar's enemy. I shall, however, go to Luceria; though he will not perhaps be much pleased with my arrival; for I cannot conceal my dislike of what has hitherto been done. If it were possible for me to sleep, I should not molest you with such long letters: if you are under the influence of the same cause, I wish you would make the same return.

LETTER II.

I AM obliged to you on every account; both for telling me what you had heard; and for not giving credit to what was inconsistent with my usual correctness; and for giving me your own opinion. I wrote one letter to Cæsar from Capua, in reply to what he had said to me about his gladiators[†]. It was short, but expressive of kindness; not only without reproach, but even with great praise, of Pompeius. For so that purpose of my letter required, wherein I exhorted him to a reconciliation. If he has communicated this, he is welcome to publish it. I have written a second letter, the same day that I write this. I could not do otherwise, considering that he had himself written to me, and likewise Balbus. I send you a copy of my letter, and believe you will find in it nothing to blame: if there should be anything, show me how I could avoid it. "Do not write at all," you will say. How will this enable one to escape those who shall please to invent? However, I will do so as far as possible. When you recall me to the recollection of what I have done, and said, and written, you act indeed a friendly part, for which I thank you; but you seem to me to judge differently from myself what is honourable and becoming for me in this cause. For, in my opinion, nothing was ever done, in any country, by any leader and head of a state, more disgracefully than by our friend; whose condition I sincerely lament. He has deserted the city, that is, his country, for which, and in which, it had been glorious to die. You appear to me not to see the magnitude of this calamity; for you remain still in your own house. But you cannot remain there without the leave of the most abandoned men. Can anything be more wretched, more disgraceful than this? We wander about like beggars with our wives and children. We have placed all our hopes in the life of one man, who is every year dangerously ill; and are not driven, but called, out of our country; which we have left, not to be preserved till our return, but to be plundered and burned; so many are there in the same situation with myself, not in their villas, not in their gardens, not even in the city; or if they are now, they will not be there long. In the mean time I must not remain even at Capua, but at Luceria. And we must now relinquish the sea-coast, and wait for Afranius and Petreius[‡]; for Labienus has lost his dignity[§]. Here you will apply to me the proverb, "What you give, that you must bear[¶]." I say nothing of myself; I leave that to others. But what dignity is there here? You, and all respectable people, are, and will continue, at your own homes. But before, who did not present himself to me? And now, who comes to this war? for so it must now be called. Vibullius has already done great things. You will know what this is from Pompeius's letter; in which observe the place that is scored. You will see what Vibullius's own opinion is of our Cæsar. But whither does this discourse lead? I am ready to sacrifice my life for Pompeius; there is nobody for whom I have a greater regard: yet not so, that I think all hope of saving the republic depends upon him alone; for you give me to understand, something differently from what you used to do, that even if he should retire from Italy, you think I ought to retire with him: which seems to me advisable neither for the republic nor for my children, and, moreover, neither right nor honourable. "What then? Will you be able to support the sight of a tyrant?" As if it signified whether I saw him, or only heard of him; or as if I could look for a higher authority than Socrates; who, when there were thirty tyrants, did not set his foot beyond the gate*. But I have besides a special reason for staying; about which I shall hope at some time to talk to you. I write this, the 17th of February, by the same lamp with which I have burned your letter; and am going immediately from Formiæ to Pompeius: if it were to treat of peace, I might be of some consideration; if of war, what part can I take?

LETTER III.

In the anxiety occasioned by this critical and wretched state of affairs, while I have no means of consulting with you in person, yet I wish to avail myself of your judgment. The whole question is this: if Pompeius should quit Italy, as I imagine he will, what you think I ought to do; and that you may the more easily give me your opinion, I will shortly explain what occurs to me on both sides. My great obligations to Pompeius in promoting my restoration, the intimacy between us, and the cause of the republic itself, induce me to think that I ought to unite with him, whether in counsel or in fortune. Added to which, if I remain, and desert that assemblage of the best and most distinguished citizens, I must fall under the dominion of one man; who, though in many respects he shows himself to be friendly to me, (and that he might be so I have, as you know, long since provided, in apprehension of this storm which hangs over us,) yet we must take into consideration both the degree of credit that is to be given to his professions, and, if it should be clear that he will indeed be friendly to me, whether it becomes a brave man, and a good citizen, to remain in that city, in which he has enjoyed the highest honours and appointments, has conducted the greatest affairs, and held the sovereign priesthood, without being any longer his own master, and with the possibility of incurring danger, and perhaps some disgrace, if ever Pompeius should restore the republic. This is what may be said on one side. See now what may be said on the other. Nothing has been done by our Pompeius wisely, nothing nobly, and, I may add, nothing but what was contrary to my own opinion and authority. I omit those old errors of cherishing, raising, and arming Cæsar against the republic; that it was he who got laws to be passed by violence, and contrary to the auspices; he that added the further Gaul to his command; he that is the son-in-law; he that was augur at the adoption of P. Clodius; he that was more earnest in my recall than in preventing my exile; he that extended the period of Cæsar's government; he that was on every occasion the advocate of Cæsar in his absence; and even in his third consulate, after he began to be the protector of the republic, exerted himself to obtain the consent of the ten tribunes to his eligibility during his absence; which he afterwards ratified by a certain law of his own; and on the 1st of March opposed the consul Marcus Marcellus, who would have put an end to the Gallic provinces*. But, to say nothing of these matters, what can be more disgraceful, what more inconsiderate, than this retreat from the city, or rather this base flight? What conditions were not preferable to the desertion of one's country? The conditions were bad, I grant; but could anything be worse than this? "But he will recover the republic." When? Or what preparations are there to encourage such a hope? Is not the country of Picenum lost? Is not the road left open to the city? Is not all the wealth of the metropolis, both public and private, surrendered to the adversary? In short, there is no party, no power, no place, where those may rally who wish well to the republic. Apulia is chosen, the most uninhabited part of Italy, and the most remote from the irruption of this war: flight, and convenience of the sea-coast, appear to be the first objects in this despondency. I took charge of Capua against my will; not that I disliked that office, but because there was no party to act with, none that showed any public sorrow, or any declared private sorrow: there was some among good men, but this was in a quiet way, as usual, and as I might have felt myself; the mob and all the weaker sort were inclined to the other side, and many were desirous of some change. I told Pompeius that I could undertake nothing without troops, and without money. I have therefore had nothing at all to do; for I saw from the first, that nothing was aimed at besides escape. If I now pursue this object, whither should I go? Certainly not with him: for when I had set out to join him, I understood that Cæsar was in those parts, so that I could not safely get to Luceria. I must sail then by the Mediterranean sea, with no certain course, and in the depth of winter. Besides, should I go with my brother, or without him? or with my son? or how? Either way I shall have great difficulty, and great anxiety. And what violence will he commit against me and my fortunes in my absence! Greater than against those of other people; because he may think that in his attacks

* They who now content themselves with staying at home, formerly professed their readiness to support the cause of the republic.

* Lysander having made himself master of Athens, placed the government in the hands of thirty tyrants.

* This probably alludes to the conduct of Terentia.

* There is reason to believe that Atticus, out of his great caution, had desired Cicero to destroy his letters, or in the mean time to keep them secured. See book ix., letter 10.

* That is, wanted to put an end to Cæsar's administration in Gaul.

upon me he will be supported by some degree of popularity. Besides, how troublesome is it to carry with me these fetters, these laurelled fasces I mean, out of Italy! And supposing the sea to be tranquil, what place would be safe for me, before I could reach him? I neither know what road I should take, nor whither I should go. But if I remain, and there be any place for me in these parts, I shall do no more than Philippus, than L. Flaccus, than Q. Mucius, did at the time of Cinna's domination, however it turned out to the last of them^b; who used nevertheless to say that he foresaw what must be the consequence; but that he preferred this, to coming up in arms against his country. Thrasylulus^c judged otherwise, and perhaps better. But there is some reason in the conduct and sentiments of Mucius, as well as in those of Thrasylulus; both in bending to the times, when it is necessary, and not letting slip an opportunity when it is offered. But in this very consideration these same fasces create an embarrassment. For supposing him to be friendly towards me, which is uncertain; but supposing it, he will offer me a triumph^d. Would it be more dangerous not to accept it; or more invidious to accept it? This, you say, is a difficult and inexplicable point. Yet explained it must be. "But how can it be done?" Now, that you may not suppose I incline to remain, because I have dwelt longer on that side; it may be, as it happens in many cases, that there is more pleading on one side, more truth on the other. Therefore I should be glad if you would give me your opinion, as upon a point of great moment, on which I would exercise an unbiassed judgment. I have a vessel ready for me, both at Caieta and at Brundisium. Whilst I am writing this account of my own concerns by night in the neighbourhood of Cales, there have arrived messengers with letters stating that Cæsar is on his way to Corfinium, and that Domitius is at Corfinium with a steady army eager to engage. I cannot think that our Cæsar will be so negligent as to desert Domitius; though he had sent on Scipio before with two cohorts to Brundisium, and had written to the consuls to desire that one of them would conduct into Sicily the legion which had been raised by Faustus. But it will be disgraceful to desert Domitius, when he is imploring his assistance. I have some hope, but not much, (though it is generally believed in these parts,) that Afranius may have had an engagement with Trebonius in the Pyrenean mountains, that Trebonius has been repulsed, and that your friend Fabius has come over with his troops; and in short, that Afranius is approaching with a strong force. If this is so, we shall perhaps remain in Italy. As it was uncertain what road Cæsar would take, and it was expected that he would go either to Capua or to Luceria, I sent Lepta to Pompeius with a letter, and returned to Formiæ, that I might not fall in with him. I wished to let you know this; and have written in a more composed state of mind than I did lately, not meaning to interpose any judgment of my own, but to request yours.

^b Q. Mucius remained in the city, and was killed.

^c Thrasylulus came against his country, Athens, to deliver it from the dominion of the thirty tyrants.

^d See book vii., in which his petition for a triumph is repeatedly mentioned.

LETTER IV.

YOUR Dionysius, for so I must call him, not mine, (who was pretty well known to me, though I chose rather to rely upon your judgment than my own,) without any regard to your testimony concerning him, which had so often been given me, has displayed his insolence in this state of fortune in which he supposed me to be. However, as far as human prudence can effect, I hope to regulate the course of events with some discretion. But what honour, what attention, has not been shown him! What commendation to others in favour of a contemptible man! I have even chosen to have my judgment impeached by my brother Quintus, and generally by all people, rather than not extol him by my praises: and have taken upon myself part of the trouble of teaching the young Ciceros, instead of applying to any other master. Ye gods! what letters have I written to him! how full of honour! how full of affection! You would suppose I was inviting Dicaearchus, or Aristoxenes; not one who was such a prattler, and so little fit to teach. "But he has a good memory^e." He shall find that I have a better^f. He has replied to my letters in such a manner, as I never did to any one whose cause I declined. For I always added, "if it is in my power;" "if I am not prevented by some former engagement." I never gave to any client, however humble, mean, or guilty, so abrupt a refusal, as he has given me. He has positively, and without qualification, cut off all communication. I never knew an instance of greater ingratitude; in which vice is included everything that is bad. But more than enough on this subject. I have got a vessel ready: but wait for a letter from you, that I may know what answer it brings to my consultation. You are apprised of C. Attius Pelignus having opened the gates of Sulmo to Antonius, though he had with him five cohorts; and that Q. Lucretius has fled from thence. Our Cæsar is gone to Brundisium, and deserted the cause. It is all over.

LETTER V

BEFORE it was light on the 22d, I wrote to you about Dionysius; and on the evening of the same day Dionysius himself came to me, moved, as I suspect, by your authority. For how can I think otherwise? Though it is true that after having done anything intemperately, he often repents. But he never was more determined than on this occasion. For what I mentioned to you, I afterwards had confirmed to me, that before he had got three miles "he began to toss his horns into the air with anger." He uttered, I mean, many imprecations, to fall, as they say, upon his own head. But observe my lenity: I put into the same packet with your letter one directed to him. This I wish to have returned to me; and for this special purpose I have sent Pollux, one of my couriers, to Rome; and have written to you to beg that, if it should have been delivered to you, you would take care to send it back, that it may not come to his hands. If there was any news, I would have written. I am anxious to hear about Corfinium^r, where the fate of the republic is to be decided. I shall be obliged to you to forward the packet, which is addressed to Des. M. Curius^s, and to recommend Tiro to Curius, that he may advance to him, as I have requested, what may be necessary for his expenses.

^e He will take advantage of what I have said in his favour.

^f I shall show him that I can resent his ill behaviour.

LETTER VI.

AFTER I had sealed the letter which I intended to send in the night, (as in fact I did, for I wrote it in the evening,) C. Sossius, the prætor, came to Formianum to my neighbour M. Lepidus, to whom he had been questor; and brought him a copy of Pompeius's letter to the consul, as follows.

"I have received a letter from L. Domitius dated the 17th of February, of which I inclose a copy. Now, though I should not write, yet I am sure you see of your own accord, of what importance it is to the republic, that all the forces should be collected as soon as possible into one place. If therefore you think well of it, you will take care to join me as soon as you can; leaving at Capua what you consider will be a sufficient guard." Then he subjoined the copy of Domitius's letter, which I sent you yesterday. Good gods! What horror do I feel! How anxious am I about the issue? I hope however that the name of Pompeius will be considerable, and considerable also the terror of his approach. I hope also, as nothing has yet hurt us, * * * I have just heard that your ague has left you. May I die if I am not as much pleased as if it had been my own case. Tell Folia that it is not right for her to keep hers any longer^t; and that it is unbecoming the usual harmony between you. I hear that my Tiro has been freed from another illness of the same kind. I find he has borrowed elsewhere for his expenses^u. But I had requested Curius, in case he should want anything. I hope it is Tiro's modesty, rather than Curius's want of liberality, that is in fault.

LETTER VII.

THE only thing remaining to complete the disgrace of our friend is, that he should refuse to assist Domitius. Nobody doubts but he will come to his relief. For my own part, I think he will not. "Will he desert then such a citizen, and those who, you know, are with him? Especially when he is at the head of thirty cohorts?" Unless I am totally mistaken, he will desert them. He is inconceivably alarmed, and thinks of nothing but escaping. He it is (for I see what is your opinion) whom you think I ought to accompany. But while I have somebody to avoid, I have nobody to follow. For when you praise and extol my profession of choosing rather to be conquered with Pompeius, than to conquer with the opposite party. I do indeed choose it; but it is with Pompeius such as he then was, or such as I believed him to be: but with him, who runs away before he knows whom he has to fear, or which way he should go; who has betrayed our cause, left his country, and is going to leave Italy; with him if I chose rather to be conquered, it has happened already, I am conquered. As to what remains, I cannot bear to look at a state of things which I never apprehended; nor indeed to look at him^v, on whose account I must lose not only my friends, but my very self. I have written to Philotimus to procure the money for my journey, either from the mint (for nobody pays), or from the Oppii, your partners^w. I shall leave to you the care of what else is requisite^x.

LETTER VIII.

O SHAMEFUL business! and therefore miserable! For I hold that whatever is base, that, or rather that only, is miserable. He had fostered Cæsar; he had suddenly begun to fear him; he had agreed to no condition of peace; had made no preparation for war; had deserted the city; had lost Picenum by his negligence; had thrust himself into Apulia; was going into Greece; was leaving us all without speaking to us, or consulting us upon so important and extraordinary a resolution. Then presently comes Demetrius's letter to him, his to the consuls. A sense of honour seemed to flash before his eyes, and I supposed him to have exclaimed with becoming manliness, "In this, which is my duty, let people attempt and plot what they will against me; for right is on my side^y." But he, bidding a long farewell to honour, goes on to Brundisium. It is reported, that Domitius, and they who were with him, when they heard it, surrendered. O grievous affair! I am prevented by anguish from writing more to you. I look anxiously for a letter from you.

LETTER IX.

I LIKE exceedingly your advice, which is both honourable and suitable to the caution required in these times. Lepidus indeed (for we almost live together, which is very grateful to him) never approved of leaving Italy: Tullus^z still less. For his letters are frequently brought to me from other people. But their opinion has less weight with me. They had never given so many pledges to the republic^{aa}. Your authority greatly influences ^r Cæsar. It seems Cicero was preparing to retreat from Cæsar and Italy, though without joining Pompeius.

^s So I venture to translate the word contubernales; for the Oppii being, as it appears, money-dealers, and living in one of Atticus's houses, may well be believed to have been connected in business with Cæcilius, to whose property Atticus had succeeded. See book x. letter 15.

^t This probably relates to his proposed journey.

^u The original is taken from Aristophanes.

^v What usually stands as the former part of this letter, will be found after book ix. letter 11, to which it obviously alludes.

^w This is probably the same L. Volcatius Tullus of whom mention is made, together with Lepidus, in the first letter of this book.

^x They had not been engaged in the service of the republic, like Cicero.

^r See letter 3 of this book.

^s This is the person under whose care Cicero had left Tiro at Patrum. See book vii. letter 2.

^t The original is mutilated in this part so as to baffle all reasonable interpretation.

me. For it holds out the means both of recovering the time that remains, and of securing the present*. But what, I beseech you, can be more wretched than this? that the one should gain applause in a most foul cause; the other, odium in the very best: that the one should be esteemed the preserver of his enemies; the other, the deserter of his friends. And in truth, however I may love my friend Cneus, as I do and ought, yet in this respect I cannot commend him, that he should not have come to the support of such people. If this is through fear, what can be more disgraceful? or if, as some suppose, he thought that his own cause would be advanced by their destruction, what can be more iniquitous? But let us have done with this; for we augment our sorrow by repeating it. On the 24th in the evening the younger Balbus called upon me on his way to the consul Lentulus; to whom he was hastening through by-ways, by command of Cæsar, with a letter, with instructions, with the promise of a provincial government if he would return to Rome. I do not think it possible to persuade him, unless they should have a personal interview. He said that Cæsar wished for nothing more, than to get up to Pompeius, which I believe; and to resume his friendship with him, which I do not believe. I even fear that all this clemency may be directed against that one object of cruelty†. The elder Balbus indeed informs me, that Cæsar wishes nothing more than to live in security, while Pompeius retains his authority. I suppose you believe this! But while I am writing, Pompeius may already have reached Brundisium, for he went lightly armed from Luceria before the legions. But this meteor‡ has dreadful vigilance, swiftness, and diligence. What will be the issue I cannot guess.

LETTER X.

DIONYSIUS having come to me contrary to my expectation, I spake to him with all civility, explained the peculiarity of the times, and desired him to let me know what were his intentions; that I did not require anything of him against his will. He replied that he was in uncertainty about his accounts; that some people did not pay; that from others the money was not yet due; with something else about his slaves: for which reasons he could not be with us. I let him have his way, and dismissed him; as tutor to the young Ciceros, not willingly; as an ungrateful man, not unwillingly. I wished you to know my opinion of his conduct.

LETTER XI.

RESPECTING the great agitation of mind with which you suppose me to be affected; it is true, indeed, yet not so great as you may perhaps imagine. For every care becomes less, when either the resolution is fixed, or when all consideration is fruitless. We may still grieve; and that I do all day long; but while it is ineffectual, I fear I may even disgrace my studies and learning. I waste therefore all my time in considering the excellence of that character which you thought I had accurately expressed in my treatise*. Do you remember then that moderator of the state, to which I would refer everything? For it is thus, if I am not mistaken, that Scipio speaks in the fifth book: "For as the proper aim of the pilot is a favourable course; that of the physician, health; that of a general, victory: so is the happiness of his countrymen, of this moderator of the state: that they may live secure in wealth, rich in forces, abundant in glory, honourable in virtue: for I would have him the person to accomplish this greatest and best of works." This has at no time been duly considered by our Cneus, and least of all on the present occasion. It is dominion that has been sought by both parties; not any endeavour to render the state happy and virtuous. Nor has he left the city because he was unable to defend it; nor Italy because he was driven out of it: but this was his purpose from the beginning, to move all lands and seas, to call up distant kings, to introduce savage nations armed against Italy, to raise the greatest armies. A dominion like that of Sylla has long since been his object, and many who are with him desire it. Think you that no agreement, no convention, could be made between them? Even yet it might: but it is not the aim of either to make us happy; both of them wish to oppose it. I have shortly exposed these matters at your request; for you wished me to give you my opinion of these calamities. I forewarn you therefore, my Atticus, not with the prophetic spirit of her‡ whom nobody believed; but anticipating by conjecture; "already in the great ocean," &c. Nearly in the same strain, I say, I may prophesy: so great a weight of evils hangs over us. And in one respect the condition of us, who remain at home, is worse than theirs who have passed over with Pompeius; inasmuch as they have only one to fear, whilst we have both. Why then did I stay behind? you will say. It may be either in obedience to you; or because I could not get up to him; or because this was more proper. I say, next summer you will see the wretched Italy trampled under foot, and shaken by the violence of both parties, who will collect together the slaves of every description. Nor is a proscription (which was the general subject of conversation at Luceria) so much to be dreaded, as the ruin of the whole country; so great will be the forces of both in this contest. I send you my opinion. But you expected perhaps some source of consolation: I can find none. Nothing can be more wretched, nothing more deplorable, nothing more disgraceful. You ask what Cæsar has written to me. What he has frequently said; that he was much pleased with my remaining quiet; and he begs me to continue so. The younger Balbus brings the same injunctions. He was on his way to the consul Lentulus with Cæsar's letter, and the promise of rewards, if he would return to Rome. But upon reckoning up the days, I think he will pass over before a meeting can take place. I wish you to be made acquainted with the meagreness of two letters which I have received from Pompeius, and my own full replies. I send you a copy of them. I am expecting the issue of this rapid march of Cæsar through Apulia to Brundisium. I wish it were anything like the Parthian incursions*. As soon as I hear anything, I will write to you. I should be glad if you would tell me what good people say. There are reported to be a great many in Rome. I am aware that you do not go into public; but you must necessarily hear a great deal. I remember your receiving a book, sent you by Demetrius Magnes, upon Concord. I should be glad if you would lend it to me. You see what subject I am considering.

Cn. Magnus, Proconsul, to Cicero, Imperator.

Q. FABIVS came to me the 29th of January. He brings information that L. Domitius with his own eleven cohorts, and fourteen cohorts which Vibullius has brought up, is on his way to join me: that he had intended to leave Corfinium the 13th of February; and that C. Hirrus with five cohorts would follow. I am of opinion you should come to me at Luceria; for here I think you will be in the greatest safety.

M. Cicero, Imperator, to Cn. Magnus, Proconsul.

I RECEIVED your letter at Formiæ the 15th of February, by which I understood that the transactions in Picenum were much more favourable than had been represented to me; and it was with pleasure that I recognised the courage and diligence of Vibullius. On the coast, over which I have been placed, I have hitherto thought it right to have a ship in readiness: for what I hear, and what I apprehend, is of such a nature, as to make me think it my duty to follow whatever plan you should advise. Now, since by your authority and counsel I am in better hope, if you think it possible to maintain Tarracina and the sea-coast, I will continue there, although there are no garrisons in the towns. For there is nobody of condition in these parts, except M. Eppius, whom I have desired to remain at Minturnæ. He is an active and careful man. But L. Torquatus, who is a brave man, and in authority, is not at Formiæ: I imagine he is gone to you. I came to Capua, agreeably to your last instructions, the very day on which you left Teanum Sidicinum; for you had desired me, together with M. Considius the prætor, to take care of the affairs in that part. When I came thither, I found that T. Ampius was raising troops with great diligence, which were transferred to Libo, who had also great zeal and authority in the colony. I remained at Capua as long as the consuls; and came thither again the 5th of February, as the consuls had appointed. After being there three days, I came back to Formiæ. At present I am uncertain what is your intention, or what is your plan of conducting the war. If you think this coast should be maintained, as I think it may, there must be somebody to take the command: it possesses great convenience and respectability, and has in it many distinguished citizens. But if all our forces are to be collected into one place, I shall not hesitate to join you immediately; which I shall be very glad to do, as I told you the day I left the city. If I appear to anybody to have been backward in this business, I do not regard it, provided I do not appear so to you: yet if, as I perceive, war must be waged, I trust I shall easily satisfy everybody. I send to you M. Tullius, my confidential freed-man, by whom, if you think fit, you may write to me.

Cn. Magnus, Proconsul, to M. Cicero, Imperator.

I HOPE you are well. I read your letter with great satisfaction, and recognised also your former spirit in support of the common safety. The consuls have joined the army which I have had in Apulia. I earnestly exhort you, by your distinguished and unceasing regard for the republic, to come to us, that we may by our united counsels afford help and assistance to this afflicted state. I think you should travel by the Appian road, and reach Brundisium quickly.

M. Cicero, Imperator, to Cn. Magnus, Proconsul.

WHEN I wrote the letter which was delivered to you at Canusium, I had no suspicion that you would cross the sea for the service of the republic; but was in great hope that we might in Italy either establish some agreement, which seemed to me very desirable, or with the highest dignity defend the republic. In the mean time, before my letter could have reached you, understanding from the instructions which you sent to the consuls by D. Lælius what was your intention, I did not wait till I should hear from you, but immediately set out, with my brother Quintus and our children, to join you in Apulia. When I came to Teanum Sidicinum, C. Messius your friend, and several others, informed me that Cæsar was on his way to Capua, and would stop at Esernia that very day. I was truly concerned, because if it were so, I considered not only that my road was intercepted, but that I was myself quite cut off from you. I therefore proceeded at that time to Cales, where I might remain till I should receive some certain information from Esernia about what I had heard. While I was at Cales there was brought to me a copy of the letter which you sent to the consul Lentulus, saying that you had received one from L. Domitius, the 17th of February, of which you subjoined a copy; and that it was of great importance to the republic, that all the forces should be collected into one place as soon as possible; and directing him to leave a sufficient guard at Capua. Upon reading this letter I was of the same opinion as everybody else, that you would proceed with all your forces to Corfinium. But as Cæsar had encamped before the town, I did not think it safe for me to go thither. While we remained in anxious expectation of the issue, we heard at once and the same time both what had happened at Corfinium, and that you had begun to make your way to Brundisium: and when I and my brother had determined to go to Brundisium, we were warned by many people, who came from Samnium and Apulia, to take care that we were not surprised by Cæsar; for that he had set out for the same place to which we were going, and would reach his destination quicker than we could. Upon which neither I, nor my brother, nor any of our friends, thought it right to run the risk of injuring not merely ourselves, but the republic, by our rashness; especially as we had little doubt but that, if even the road were safe, yet we should not now be able to overtake you. In the mean time I received your letter of the 20th of February from Canusium, in which you beg that we would come quickly to Brundisium. This I received on the 27th, when I did not doubt but you would already have arrived at Brundisium. The road seemed to be quite closed against us; and ourselves to be taken as completely as those who had gone to Corfinium: for I consider as taken, not only those who have fallen into the hands of armed people, but those likewise who are excluded from certain districts, and have come within the garrisons and posts of their enemies. In this state my first wish was, that I had always been with you, as I mentioned to you when I wanted to decline the command of Capua; which I did, not for the sake of avoiding the trouble, but because I saw that the city was incapable of being kept without an army, and I was unwilling to expose myself to the same accident, which I lament in the case of our brave friends^a. But when I was prevented from being with you, I wish I could have been made acquainted with your designs: for it was impossible for me to guess them; as I should sooner have thought anything, than that this cause of the republic could not be maintained in Italy under your direction. I do not mean however to find fault with your determination; but I mourn over the fortune of the republic; nor do I the less believe you to have acted with good reason because I am unacquainted with your purpose. I am persuaded you remember what was always my opinion, first, respecting the maintaining peace, even upon unequal conditions; then respecting the city; for on the subject of Italy you never opened yourself to me. But I do not assume to myself that my opinion ought to have prevailed: I adopted yours. And I did this, not for the republic's sake, about which I despaired, rent as it now is, and incapable of being raised up without a ruinous civil war; but I sought you, and wished to be with you, and will not omit an opportunity of it, should any present. In all this business I was well aware that I should not give satisfaction to such as were eager for fighting: for, in the first place, I professed that I wished nothing more than peace: not but I feared the same consequences as they did, but I esteemed even those to be more tolerable than a civil war. Then again, after the war was begun, when I found that conditions of peace were offered to you, and that you made an honourable and full reply to them, I formed my own determination, which I trusted, according to your usual kindness towards me, I should easily explain to your satisfaction. I recollected that I was one who, for my distinguished services to the republic, had been subjected to the saddest and most cruel sufferings; that I was one who, if I had offended him^b, to whom even while we were in arms there was granted a second consulate, and a most ample triumph, I should be again exposed to the same persecution; since the attacks of wicked men on my person seemed always to have something of popularity. And this I was not forward to suspect, till it was openly threatened.

* That is, soon over.

Nor did I so much dread it, if it were necessary; as I thought it prudent to avoid it, if it could be done with honour. You see shortly the motives by which I was actuated as long as there was any hope of peace. Circumstances have removed all power of doing anything further. But I have a ready answer for those who are dissatisfied with me: for I have been no more a friend to C. Caesar^c than they; nor have they been more attached to the republic than I. The difference between us consists in this; that while they are excellent citizens, and I am not deficient in the same reputation, I preferred settling these disputes by treaty, which I understood to be your wish also; they by arms. And since this opinion has prevailed, I shall take care that neither the republic may lose the affection of a citizen, nor you that of a friend.

LETTER XII.

THE weakness of my eyes is become more troublesome even than it was before; I determined, however, to dictate this rather than send no letter at all by Gallus Fabius, who is so much attached to us both. Yesterday I wrote myself, as well as I was able, with a prophecy, which I wish may prove false. The occasion of this letter is, not only that I may let no day pass without writing to you, but, what is a juster reason, that I may beg you to employ a little portion of your time (and it will not cost you much) to let me thoroughly understand your sentiments. I am still at liberty to choose what course I should adopt. Nothing has been neglected which does not admit, not merely of a plausible, but a satisfactory excuse. For surely I have not done wrong in wishing to decline the proffered administration of Capua, that I might avoid any suspicion either of backwardness in raising troops or of treachery; nor, after the conditions of peace brought by L. Caesar and Fabatus, in taking care not to offend him, to whom Pompeius, while they were both in arms, had offered the consulate and a triumph. Neither can anybody justly blame these last measures of not crossing the sea, which, though it was matter of consideration, yet it was not in my power to accomplish; nor ought I to have suspected such a step, especially as from Pompeius's own letter I concluded (and I perceive that you were of the same opinion) that he would go to support Domitius. And in truth I wanted a longer time to determine what was right, and what I ought to do. In the first place then, though you have given me generally your opinion on this subject, yet I should be glad if you would write to me more particularly. In the next place I wish you to look a little into futurity, and fancy to yourself the character I ought to support, and how you think I can be of most use to the republic,—whether there is any room for a pacific personage, or whether everything rests with the military. I, who measure everything by duty^d, recollect, however, your advice^e, which if I had followed I should not have felt the miseries of those times. I remember what you then recommended through Theophanes and Culeo, and I often recollected it with regret. Now then at least let me revert to that estimation of things which I formerly rejected, and consider not only what is glorious but a little also what is expedient. But I prescribe nothing; I wish you to give me exactly your own opinion. I should be glad also if you would find out as correctly as you can (and you will meet with persons through whom you may do it) what our friend Lentulus, what Domitius, is doing, or what he means to do; how they conduct themselves,—whether they accuse or are angry with anybody. With anybody, do I say? With Pompeius. Pompeius throws all the blame upon Domitius, as appears by his letter, of which I send you a copy. You will see after these matters; and, as I mentioned to you before, I should be obliged to you to send me the book which Demetrius Magnes presented to you upon Concord.

Cn. Magnus, Proconsul, to C. Marcellus¹ and L. Lentulus, Consuls.

As I considered that, while our troops were dispersed, we could neither render any service to the republic nor defend ourselves,—therefore I wrote to L. Domitius first to come to me himself with his whole force, or if he doubted about himself, to send me the nineteen cohorts which were on their way to me from Picenum. What I feared has happened,—that Domitius was hemmed in, without being strong enough to form an encampment, because he had my nineteen cohorts and his own twelve distributed in three different towns, having placed part at Alba and part at Sulmo,—nor could he disengage them if he would. I am now, therefore, in the greatest anxiety. For I wish to relieve so many valuable men from the hazard of a siege, and am unable to go to their assistance,—for I do not think it safe to let these two legions be conducted thither,—out of which I have not been able to collect more than fourteen² cohorts, having sent a garrison to Brundisium, and not thinking that Canusium ought to be left unprotected in my absence. I sent word to D. Lælius that I hoped to have an increase of force, so that if you thought well of it one of you might join me; the other might go into Sicily with such troops as you have obtained at Capua and in the neighbourhood, together with those which have been raised by Faustus; that Domitius with his twelve cohorts should proceed to the same destination; that all the remaining forces should be collected at Brundisium, and from thence should be transported in ships to Dyrrachium. Now, since at this time I am no more able than you to go to the assistance of Domitius, I must leave him to extricate³ himself through the mountains. I cannot suffer the enemy to attack these fourteen cohorts, which I have in a doubtful disposition, or to come up with me in my march: on which account I have thought it right (and I find that Marcellus, and the rest of our order¹ who are here, are of the same opinion) to conduct the force I have with me to Brundisium. I beg you to collect whatever soldiers you can, and to come to the same place as soon as possible. I think you may distribute among the men which you have with you the arms you were going to send me. You will confer a great service on the republic by transporting the supernumerary arms on beasts of burden to Brundisium. I should be glad if you would give notice to my people upon this subject. I have sent to the prætors P. Lupus and C. Coponius to join me, and to conduct to you what troops they possessed.

¹ In the text it is M. Marcellus; but, as there can be little doubt of this being a mistake, I have taken the liberty of altering it.

Cn. Magnus, Proconsul, to Domitius, Proconsul.

I AM surprised that you have not written to me, and that all information about the republic should come to me from others rather than from you. While our troops are dispersed it is impossible for us to be equal to our adversaries. With our forces united I hope we may be of service to the republic and to the common safety. When, therefore, you had determined, as Vibullius wrote me word, to leave Corfinium the 9th of February with the army, and to come to me, I wonder what should have caused you to change your mind. For the reason which Vibullius mentions is of little weight, that you had heard of Cæsar's having left Firmum, and being arrived at Castrum Truentinum; for the nearer the enemy approached, the more expeditiously ought you to have acted, in order to join me before Cæsar could obstruct your road or cut off the communication between us: therefore, I beg and entreat you again and again, as I have not ceased to do in my former letters, to come to Luceria on the earliest day, before Cæsar can bring together into one place the forces which he purposed to collect, and separate us from each other: or if you meet with impediments from some who would save their own troops, at least it is reasonable that I should desire you would send me those cohorts which are come from Picenum and Cambrinium, and have left their own fortunes.

Cn. Magnus, Proconsul, to Domitius, Proconsul.

M. CALENIUS brought me your letter the 18th of February, in which you say that you mean to observe Cæsar's motions, and if he should attempt to come towards me by the sea-coast that you will immediately join me in Samnium,—or if he should loiter about those parts that you are disposed to resist him, whenever he comes within your reach. I have a just sense of your spirit and courage in this determination; but we must take great care that our forces are not so divided as to render us unequal to our adversary, who has already a great many troops, and will shortly have more. For with your usual prudence you ought to consider not only how many cohorts Cæsar can at present bring against you, but what numbers of cavalry and infantry he will in a short time collect. This is confirmed by a letter which I have received from Bursenius, in which he says, what I have heard also from others¹, that Curio is collecting the garrisons from Umbria and Tuscany, and proceeding to join Cæsar. If these forces should unite, and part should be sent to Alba, part should come against you,—without fighting, but only defending themselves in their quarters, you will be embarrassed, and unable alone to resist such numbers with your present force, so as to admit of your foraging. For these reasons I strongly advise you to come hither as soon as possible with your whole force. The consuls have determined to do the same. I sent you advice by Metuscius, that it was necessary to prevent my two legions from being brought to face Cæsar without the Picentine cohorts. You must not, therefore, be uneasy if you should hear of my retreating, in case Cæsar comes towards me,—as I think it right to provide against the embarrassment of being surrounded; for I can neither form a camp, owing to the season of the year and the disposition of the soldiers, nor can I safely bring together the troops out of all the towns for fear of having my retreat cut off. I have therefore collected at Luceria not more than fourteen cohorts. The consuls will either bring all the garrisons, or will go into Sicily: for it is expedient either to have a strong army with which we may rely upon breaking through the enemy, or else to get possession of such countries in which we can defend ourselves,—neither of which is at present the case; for Cæsar is already master of a great part of Italy, and his army is superior both in appointments and numbers to mine. We must, therefore, take care to pay the utmost attention to the republic. I beg you again and again to come to me as soon as possible with all your forces. We may yet raise up the republic if we unite our counsels in conducting the business; but if we are disunited we must be weak. Such is my ultimate opinion.

Since writing this, Sica has brought me your letter and instructions. Respecting your wish that I should go to you, I do not consider it possible for me to do it, because I have no great confidence in these legions.

Cn. Magnus, Proconsul, to Domitius, Proconsul.

I RECEIVED your letter the 17th of February, in which you inform me that Cæsar has pitched his camp before Corfinium. What I supposed, and forewarned you, has happened,—that he does not wish at present to engage in battle with you; but that he will collect together all his forces and hamper you so as to prevent your joining me, and uniting those troops of the best citizens with these legions, whose disposition is doubtful,—which makes me the more concerned at your account. For I cannot sufficiently rely upon the disposition of the soldiers whom I have with me to risk the whole fortune of the republic; nor have those joined who have been enrolled by the consuls out of the levies. Therefore try if by any means you can even now manage to extricate yourself, that you may come hither as soon as possible before all the adversary's forces are united. For men cannot very quickly arrive here from the levies,—and if they did, it does not escape you how little they can be trusted against veteran legions while they are not so much as known to each other.

LETTER XIII.

THE hand-writing of a clerk will show you that my eyes are not yet well; and the same cause will make me short; though at present I have nothing to tell you. My only expectation is in the news from Brundisium. If Cæsar should have come up with our friend Cnæus, the hope of peace is very doubtful; but if he should have passed over first, there is danger of a destructive war. But do you perceive with what a man the republic has to do? how acute! how vigilant! how ready! If forsooth he puts nobody to death, and plunders nobody, he will be most loved by the very people who were most afraid of him. I have a good deal of conversation with the towns-people, and with those from the country; they care absolutely about nothing but their fields, and their pleasure-houses, and their pelf. See how things are changed. Him¹, on whom they once relied, they fear; and they love this man¹, whom they used to dread. I cannot without grief reflect upon the errors and misconduct of our party, through which this has happened. I told you what dangers I apprehended. I am in expectation of hearing from you.

LETTER XIV.

I AM afraid my daily letters must be troublesome to you, especially as I can send you no news, nor indeed find any new subject to write upon. And if I were expressly to send messengers to you about nothing at all, I should act absurdly; but when people are going, particularly my own servants, I cannot suffer them to go without writing something to you. Besides, believe me, I feel some relief in these miseries while I talk, as it were, with you; and still more when I read your letters. I think indeed there has been no time since this flight and trepidation, when this intercourse of letters could with more propriety be interrupted; as nothing new is heard at Rome; nor in these parts, which are two or three days nearer to Brundisium than you are. It is at Brundisium that all the struggle of this first season passes. I am distracted with anxiety about the event. But I shall know all before you; for I find that Cæsar set out from Corfinium on the afternoon of the same day on which Pompeius set out in the morning from Canusium, that is the 21st of February. But such is the manner of Cæsar's march, and with such allowances does he urge the speed of his soldiers, that I dread his getting to Brundisium sooner than is to be wished. You will say, "What good is there in anticipating the distress of such an event, which in three days you will know?" There is none indeed. But, as I said before, I love to converse with you. Besides, you must know that I begin to waver in my opinion, which seemed to be already fixed. For the authorities², which you approve, are not satisfactory to me. For what have they ever done to distinguish themselves in the republic? or who expects from them anything praise-worthy? not that I mean to applaud those who have crossed the sea for the purpose of increasing the preparations for war; however intolerable may be the present state of affairs; for I see how great and how ruinous the war must be. But I am influenced by regard for an individual, to whom it seems due that I should be a companion in his flight, and an assistant in restoring the republic. "So often then do you change your mind?" I converse with you as with myself; and who is there but in a case of such moment argues variously with himself? at the same time I wish to elicit your opinion; that if it is still the same, I may be the more determined; if it is changed, that I may assent to it. It is of importance to the subject of my doubt, to know what Domitius will do, and what our friend Lentulus. We have various reports about Domitius; sometimes, that he is at Tibertum, or at Lepidus's house; or that Lepidus is gone with him to the city; which I find is not true; for Lepidus says that it is uncertain where he is gone, and that he does not know whether his object be to conceal himself, or to reach the sea. He is equally ignorant about his son. He adds, what is distressing, that a large sum of money, which Domitius had at Corfinium, has never been delivered to him. We hear nothing of Lentulus. I should be glad if you could find out these things, and let me know.

LETTER XV.

On the 3d of March, Ægypta delivered to me two letters from you; one an old one, dated February 26, which you mention to have given to Pisarius, whom I have not seen. In this you express your anxiety to know what has been done by Vibullius, who was sent on^a before. But Cæsar has not so much as seen him. In another letter I perceive that you are aware of this. You desire also to know how I receive Cæsar on his return; but I mean to avoid him altogether. You mention besides, that you meditate a Hæmonian flight^b, and a change of your life; which I think you must adopt: also that you are uncertain whether Domitius has his fasces^c with him; but as soon as you know, you will inform me. You have my reply to your first letter. There are two subsequent ones, both dated the 28th of February, which have plucked me from my former resolution^d, in which, as I before wrote to you, I was already wavering. What you say, "that Jupiter himself forbids it," has no weight with me. For there is danger in displeasing either party: and the superiority is still uncertain, though the worst cause has the appearance of being best provided. I am not moved either by the consuls, who are themselves more easily moved than a leaf or a feather. It is the consideration of my duty that distracts me, and has done from the beginning. It is certainly safer to remain; but is thought more honourable to cross the sea. At the same time I would rather many should think I had acted imprudently, than a few dishonourably. As to what you ask about Lepidus and Tullius; it is not doubted^e but they will present themselves to Cæsar, and will go into the senate. Your last letter is dated the first of March, in which you wish for a meeting^f, and do not despair of peace. But while I write this, I neither believe they will meet; nor, if they did, that Pompeius would agree to any terms. You seem to entertain no doubt of what I ought to do, provided the consuls should cross the sea: they certainly cross it, or as things are now, have already crossed. But observe, that, except Appius, there is scarcely anybody who has not a right to do so^g. For they either have some command, as Pompeius, as Scipio, Setenas, Fannius, Voconius, Sestius, and the consuls themselves, who have by ancient custom the privilege of visiting all the provinces; or they are lieutenants under these. But I do not wish to argue the point. I see what is your opinion, and am pretty well satisfied on the subject of my duty. I would write more, if I could do it myself^h; I shall be better able two days hence. I send you a copy of Balbus Cornelius's letter, which I received the same day as yours, that you may pity my condition when you see me thus mockedⁱ.

^c Domitius had been nominated to succeed Cæsar in Gaul. If he had the fasces carried before him, it would be a mark of his assuming the authority in opposition to Cæsar. His example would be valuable to Cicero, who was likewise encumbered with his lictors. See letter 1 of this book.

Balbus to Cicero, Imperator.

UNDERTAKE, I entreat you, Cicero, the care and consideration most becoming your high character, of bringing back again to their former harmony Cæsar and Pompeius, who have been torn asunder by the perfidy of certain persons. Believe me, Cæsar will not only put himself in your power, but will esteem it a great favour conferred upon him, if you apply yourself to this business. I should be glad if Pompeius would do the same; though I rather wish, than expect, that he can be brought to any terms at such a time. But when he has stopped his flight, and laid aside his fears, I shall begin not to despair of the influence your authority may have with him. Cæsar is pleased; and I am most particularly so, with your wishing my friend Lentulus the consul to remain here. For I have that regard for him, that I do not love Cæsar better. If he had suffered me to talk with him as I used to do, and had not wholly rejected my conversation, I should be less uneasy than I am. Do not imagine that at this time anybody is more vexed, ^a I have interpreted this sentence as if the words non dubitant were independent of illi, which latter word I conceive to be connected with Auturi sint. "People do not doubt but they will join Cæsar." For this interpretation of dubitant, see book iv. letter 3, note 1. Otherwise it appears very harsh to say that they did not themselves doubt but they should join him, &c.

than I, when I see him, whom I love more than myself, conducting himself in his consulate like any thing rather than a consul. But if he will be ruled by you, and will take my word about Cæsar, and spend the remaining part of his consulate in Rome; I shall begin to entertain hope, that by the recommendation even of the senate, upon your authority and at his motion, Pompeius and Cæsar may be united. If this is accomplished, I shall think I have lived long enough. I am sure you must approve of Cæsar's whole conduct respecting Cornificius; as in such a business it could not terminate more favourably, than by being effected without bloodshed. I am glad you were pleased with the arrival of mine and your friend Balbus^a. All that he has told you about Cæsar, or that Cæsar has written, I am persuaded, whatever turn his affairs may take, he will prove to you by his conduct that he has written in great sincerity.

LETTER XVI.

EVERYTHING is ready for me, excepting a road to conduct me in secrecy and safety to the Adriatic sea. For I cannot take advantage of the sea here⁷, at this season of the year. But how shall I get thither, where my inclination leads me, and circumstances call me? For it is necessary to set out speedily, that I may not meet with some obstacle to stop me. Yet my inducement to go is not he^a whom one might suppose; whom I have long known to be a bad politician, and now find to be also a bad general. It is not he therefore that influences me; but the talk of the world, of which I am informed by Philotinus. He says that I am reproached by all the principal people. Ye gods! by what principal people? By those who are running to meet, and to sell themselves to Cæsar? The towns salute him as a god. And they do not dissemble, as when they put up vows for Pompeius in his sickness: but whatever this Pisistratus^a has not inflicted, is as much a subject of gratitude, as if he had prevented some other person from inflicting it. This man^b they hope to propitiate; the other^c they think exasperated. What greetings do you think are made from the towns? What honours? "They are afraid," you will say. I believe it; but they are more afraid of the other^d. They are delighted with Cæsar's insidious clemency: they dread Pompeius's anger. The 850 judges^e, who were particularly attached to our Cæsar, some of whom I see every day, dread certain threats of his at Luceria^f. I ask again then, who are these principal people, who would drive me out, while they remain themselves at home? Nevertheless, whoever they are, "I respect the Trojans^g." At the same time I know what I have to hope; and go to join one, who is better prepared to lay waste Italy than to conquer it; in short, whom I expect—indeed while I am writing this, March 2d, I am expecting to hear something from Brundisium. What something? How shamefully he^h has run away from thence; and by what road this conquerorⁱ returns, and whither. Which when I have ascertained, if he comes by the Appian road, I think of going to Arpinum.

BOOK IX.

LETTER I.

BEFORE you read this, I imagine I shall know what has been done at Brundisium; for Cæsar set out from Canusium the 22d of February, and I am writing the 6th of March, the 18th day afterwards¹. In the mean time I am distracted with the expectation of every hour; and am surprised that no rumour even should yet have reached us. This silence is quite wonderful. But it is perhaps idle to vex oneself about what must soon be known. I am uneasy at not yet having been able to find out where our friend Lentulus, where Domitius is. And I want to know, that I may the more readily understand what they mean to do; whether they will join Pompeius; and, if so, by what way, or when they will go. I understand the city is already full of the principal citizens, and that Sosius and Lupus^a, whom our Cæsar expected to be at Brundisium before him, are trying causes. From these parts numbers are going up. Even M. Lepidus, with whom I used to spend my day, thinks of going to-morrow. I shall however remain in Formianum, that I may receive the earlier intelligence; I then design to go to Arpinum; and thence to the Adriatic sea by the most unfrequented road, having first set aside or wholly dismissed my lictors. For I hear that many respectable people, who on this and former occasions have rendered good service to the republic, disapprove of my delay, and make many severe observations upon me in their convivial meetings. Let us give way then, and in order to show that we are good citizens, let us make war upon Italy by sea^b and land: and let us once more light up against us the enmity of wicked men, which was just extinguished; and let us follow the counsels of Lucceius and Theophanes^m. For Scipio either goes into Syria by his lot, or honourably attends his son-in-lawⁿ, or avoids the anger of Cæsar: the Marcelli, if they were not afraid of Cæsar's sword, would stay behind: Appian is influenced by the same apprehension, and some recent causes of enmity: besides him, and C. Cassius, the others are lieutenants; Faustus is proquæstor: I am the only person at liberty to choose the course I shall take^o. My brother will go with me; though it is not reasonable that he should share my fortunes on this occasion, which will more particularly expose him to Cæsar's displeasure; but I cannot prevail upon him to stay. We shall thus give to Pompeius what we owe him. Indeed nobody else moves me; neither the talk of good men, of whom there are none, nor the cause itself, which has been conducted timidly, and will be prosecuted wickedly^p. To him, to him alone I give this, while he does not even ask it, but supports (as he says^q) not his own cause, but that of the public. I shall be glad to know what you think about going to Epirus.

¹ In the original it is the 14th day, because the Romans, in their computation of time, were accustomed to include both the first and the last day.

^a The two prætors.

LETTER II.

THOUGH I am expecting a longer letter from you on the 7th of March, which I think is your well day, yet I have thought it right to reply to that short one which you despatched on the 5th, when the fit was going off. You say you are glad that I have staid; and tell me that you continue in your opinion. But in your former letters you seemed to me not to doubt but that I ought to go, provided Cnæus should embark with a respectable attendance, and the consuls should pass over. Have you then forgot this? or did I not rightly understand you? or have you changed your opinion? But either in the letter which I am expecting I shall see distinctly what you think, or I shall solicit another. Nothing has yet been heard from Brundisium. What a difficult and hopeless state! How in reasoning upon it you leave nothing unsaid! Yet in conclusion, how you explain nothing of your real sentiments! You are glad that I am not with Pompeius; and yet you state how disgraceful it would be for me to be present^r while anything is said against him, and how impossible to approve it. I must certainly then oppose it. "God forbid," you say. What therefore is to be done, if in the one case there is guilt, in the other punishment? "Obtain," you say, "from Cæsar leave to absent yourself, and to remain quiet." Must I then descend to supplication? O sad! and what if it is denied me? And respecting my triumph, you say that I shall be at liberty to do as I please. But what if Cæsar should press it upon me? Should I accept it? What can be more disgraceful? Should I refuse? He will think that he is wholly spurned; more so than in the affair of the twenty commissioners^s: and he is accustomed, in exculpating himself, to throw upon me all the blame of those times; that I am so hostile to him, that I will not even receive honour at his hands. How much more unkindly will he bear this! just so much as the honour itself is greater, and he is more powerful. For as to what you say, that you doubt not but Pompeius is greatly offended with me at this time; I see no reason why he should be so at this time. Can he, who never acquainted me with his intention, till Cornifinus had been lost; can he complain that I did not go to Brundisium, when Cæsar was between me and it? Besides, he knows that his complaining on that account is unjustifiable: he supposes me to have been better informed than himself about the weakness of the towns, about the levies, about peace, about the state of the city, about the treasury, about the occupation of Picenum. But if I would not go when it was in my power, then indeed he might be angry. Which I do not regard from fear of his doing me any harm; (for what can he do? "Who is a slave, that is not afraid to die?"^t) but because I abhor the imputation of ingratitude. I trust therefore that my going to him, at whatever time it should be, would, as you say^u, be acceptable. As to what you say, that if Cæsar acted with more moderation, you could give a more deliberate opinion; how is it possible that he should not act ruinously? His life, his manners, his former actions, the plan of his undertaking, his companions, the strength of the good, or even their firmness, demand it. I had scarcely read your letter, when Postumus Curtius came to me on his way to Cæsar, talking of nothing but fleets and armies: he was seizing Spain; occupying Asia, Sicilia, Africa, Sardinia, and presently pursuing Pompeius into Greece. I must go therefore, that I may be his companion, not so much in war as in flight; for I cannot bear the scoffs of those people, whoever they are. They assuredly are not, as they are called, good; yet I wish to know what it is they say; and I earnestly beg you to find out, and to inform me. Hitherto I am quite ignorant of what has been done at Brundisium. When I know, I shall take counsel from circumstances and opportunity, but shall be regulated by you.

LETTER III.

DOMITIVUS's son passed through Formis on the 8th, hastening to his mother at Naples; and upon my servant Dionysius asking particularly about his father, he desired I might be told that he was in the city. But I had heard that he was gone either to Pompeius, or into Spain. I should be glad to know how this is; for it is of consequence to the subject of my present deliberation; that if he is certainly not gone anywhere, Cnæus may understand the difficulty of my leaving Italy, while it is all occupied by troops and garrisons, especially in winter. If it were a more favourable time of year, it would be possible to go by the Southern sea: now nothing can pass but by the Adriatic, the road to which is intercepted. You will inquire therefore about Domitius, and about Lentulus. No report has yet arrived from Brundisium, and this is the 9th of March, on which day, or the day before, I imagine Cæsar would reach Brundisium; for on the first he stopped at Arpi. If you would hearken to Postumus, he will pursue Cæsar; for, by conjecture from state of the weather and the number of days, he supposed him already to have passed over. For my own part, I do not think Cæsar will be able to get sailors; he is himself very confident, and the more so, because the liberality of the man is known to the people concerned in the boats. But it is impossible I can much longer remain in ignorance of this whole Brundisian business.

LETTER IV.

THOUGH I feel some repose so long as I am writing to you, or reading your letters; yet I want myself a subject to write about, and am persuaded you do so too. For that familiar communication, which passes between us, while our minds are at ease, is excluded in these times; and what is appropriate to the times, is already exhausted. But, that I may not resign myself wholly to sadness, I have taken up certain subjects of a political nature, and suited to the times; that I may both withdraw my mind from complaints, and may exercise myself in matters of present concern. Such are the following. If it be right to remain in one's country after it is subjected to a tyrant. Being so subjected, if every means should be employed to dissolve the tyranny, even at the risk of ruining the city. If care must be taken, that the person who executes this be not himself exalted. If it be right to succour one's country, under a tyrant, by opportunity and reasoning, rather than by war. If, when one's country is subjected to a tyrant, it be consistent with the duty of a good citizen to be quiet, and retire. If every danger ought to be hazarded for the sake of freedom. If war and siege ought to be brought upon one's country when oppressed by tyranny. If one, who does not attempt to put down a tyranny, may yet be reckoned among the number of good citizens. If we ought to support our benefactors and friends in political struggles, even when we think them to have acted imprudently. If one who has rendered signal service to his country, and on that very account has incurred troubles and envy, should voluntarily expose himself for his country's sake. If it be permitted him to make provision for himself and his family, and to leave state affairs to those in power. Exercising myself in these questions, and writing on both sides in Greek and in Latin, I divert my attention a little from uneasiness, and contemplate something of real interest. But I fear I may address you unseasonably; for if the person who brought your letter came straight hither, it will fall upon your sick day.

LETTER V.

You wrote to me on your birthday a letter full of advice, and at once expressive of the greatest kindness, and the greatest good sense. Philotimus delivered it to me the day after he had received it from you. The circumstances you mention are very difficult to arrange; the way to the Adriatic; the voyage by the Mediterranean; the departure to Arpinum, as if to avoid Cæsar; the remaining at Formiæ, as if on purpose to congratulate him. But nothing is more wretched than to see what presently, presently I say, must be seen. I have had Postumus^v with me: I told you how consequential he was. Q. Fusius likewise called upon me; with what an air! with what insolence! He was hastening to Brundisium; charging Pompeius with wickedness, the senate with fickleness and folly. Shall I, who cannot bear this in my villa, be able to bear Curtius in the senate? Or suppose me to bear it with ever so good a stomach; what must be the issue when I am called upon; "Speak, M. 'Tullius'?" I say nothing of the republic, which I consider as lost both by the wounds it has received, and by the remedies which are prepared for it. But what shall I do about Pompeius? with whom (for why should I deny it?) I am quite angry. For the causes of events always affect us more than the events themselves. When I consider therefore these miseries (and what can be worse?) or rather when I reflect that they have been brought on by his means and his fault, I am more irritated against him than against Cæsar himself: in the same manner as our forefathers marked the day of the battle of the Allia^w, as sadder than that of the taking the city; because the latter calamity was the consequence of the other: therefore the one is still held sacred, the other not even known to the common people. Thus am I angry while I recollect the errors of ten years past (among which was that year of affliction to me, when he, to say nothing worse, did not defend me), and perceive the rashness, the baseness, the negligence of the present time. But these things are now erased from my mind. I think of the benefits I have received from him, and think also of his own dignity. I understand, later indeed than I could wish, by reason of Balbus's letters and conversation; but I see plainly that nothing else is aimed at, nothing else has been aimed at from the beginning, but his death. Shall I then, (if Achilles, according to Homer, when his mother goddess told him that his fate would presently follow that of Hector, replied, "Would that I might die immediately, since I could not prevent the death of my friend;" what if not only a friend, but also a benefactor; such a man too, and engaged in such a cause? And shall I then) think these duties to be trafficked away for the sake of life? I place no reliance on your principal people, and now no more defer to them. I see how they give themselves, and will give themselves, to this man. Do you think those decrees of the towns for Pompeius's health bear any comparison with these congratulations of victory? "They are afraid," you will say. Themselves say they were afraid before. But let us see what has been done at Brundisium. From that perhaps will arise my determination, and another letter.

^v Postumus Curtius. See letter 2 of this book.

^w The Gauls defeated the Romans at the river Allia, previous to their taking the city.

^x The context appears to me to require an interrogation in this place.

LETTER VI.

I HAVE yet heard nothing from Brundisium, Balbus has written from Rome, saying that he supposes the consul Lentulus to have crossed the sea, without being met by the younger Balbus; who had already heard this at Canusium, from whence he wrote to his uncle. And he added that the six cohorts, which had been at Alba, had gone over to Curius by the Minucian road; that Cæsar had written to inform him of it, and would shortly be at Rome. I shall follow your advice, and shall not hide myself at Arpinum at this time; though I wished to invest my son with the toga of manhood at Arpinum⁷, and had intended to leave this as my excuse to Cæsar. But he might perhaps be offended at that very circumstance, that I should not rather do it at Rome. If, however, it is right to meet him, it is best here. We will then consider the rest; whether I should go, and by what road, and when. Domitius, as I hear, is in the neighbourhood of Cosa⁸; and, as they say, is prepared to sail. If to Spain, I do not approve it; if to Cænus, I commend him: but anywhere rather than to see Curtius⁹, whom even I, that have been his patron, cannot bear to look at. What then? Must I bear others¹⁰? But I must be quiet, that I may not aggravate my own fault: for through my affection to the city, that is, to my country, and hoping that affairs might be compromised, I have managed so as to be completely intercepted and taken. Since writing the above I have received a letter from Capua to this effect: Pompeius has crossed the sea with all the troops that he had with him, amounting to 30,000 men, besides the two consuls, and those tribunes of the people and senators, who were with him, all with their wives and children. He is said to have embarked the 4th of March, from which day the winds have been northerly. They say that he either cut in two, or burned, all the vessels which he did not use. The letter containing this account was brought to L. Metellus, the tribune of the people, at Capua, from his mother-in-law, Clodia, who herself passed over. I was before solicitous and anxious, as indeed the circumstances required, while I could bring my mind to no conclusion: but now, since Pompeius and the consuls have left Italy, I am no longer anxious, but burn with grief; and, as Homer says, "Neither is my mind sound, but I am distracted." Believe me, I am not master of myself, so great is the disgrace I seem to have incurred. In the first place, by not having been with Pompeius, whatever plan he adopted; then, in not having been with the good, however ill their cause was conducted. Especially when the very persons for whose sake I was more timid in exposing myself to the risks of fortune, my wife, my daughter, the young Ciceros, wished me to follow that course; and considered this to be base and unworthy of me. My brother Quintus, indeed, said he should be satisfied with whatever I chose; and he followed it with perfect complacency. I now read over your letters from the beginning; and they afford me some comfort. The first advice and beg me not to throw myself away; the next show that you are glad I have remained. When I read these, I think myself less blameable; but it is only while I am reading them: afterwards my regret again bursts forth, and, as it is said, "I am haunted with shame." I beseech you, therefore, my Titus, pluck out from me this trouble, or at least diminish it either by consolation, or advice, or any way you can. But what can you do? or what can any man? Hardly any god. I am considering (as you advise, and hope may be effected) how I can get Cæsar's permission to absent myself when anything is agitated in the senate against Cænus: but I fear I may not obtain it. Furnius has arrived from him; and, that you may know whose example I follow, he brings word that Q. Titinius' son is with Cæsar. He sends me greater thanks than I could wish. What he asks of me, in few words indeed, but energetically, you shall see by his own letter. How unfortunate that you should have been unwell! Had we been together, there surely would have been no want of counsel—"And going two in company," &c. But, let us not act over the past; let us provide for what remains. These two things have hitherto deceived me; at first, the hope of accommodation; upon which taking place I had wished to pass my old age free from anxiety and popular strife¹¹; afterwards, the understanding that Pompeius had actually engaged in a cruel and deadly warfare. In truth I thought it argued a better citizen, and a better man, rather to undergo any punishment, than not only to take the lead, but to take any part in such cruelty. It appears preferable even to die than to be leagued with such men. Think of these matters, my Atticus, or rather resolve. I can bear any event better than my present anguish.

Cæsar, Imperator, to Cicero, Imperator.

HAVING but just seen our friend Furnius, without being able conveniently either to speak to him or hear him, being in a hurry, and actually on my road, with my troops already sent on before; I could not, however, let pass the opportunity of writing to you, and sending him to thank you. If I have frequently done this, yet I am likely to do it still more frequently; so greatly am I obliged to you. Especially I have to beg of you, as I trust I shall soon arrive in Rome, to let me see you there, that I may be able to avail myself of your advice, influence, dignity, and assistance in everything. I must end as I began, and request you to excuse my haste, and the shortness of my letter. You will hear the rest from Furnius.

LETTER VII.

I HAD written a letter to you, which should have been sent the 12th of March; but the person to whom I meant to entrust it did not go that day. But the very same day, came that swift-foot, as Salvius called him, and brought me your very satisfactory letter, which again instilled into me some little life. Restored I cannot call myself: but what is next to this you have done. Trust me, I now no longer think of a prosperous termination: for I see that as long as these two, or this one, is living, we shall never have a republic. Therefore I now lay aside all hope of retirement, and am prepared for every severity. My only fear was that of doing, or, I may say, of having done anything discreditable. Let me assure you then that your letter is very valuable to me; and not only that longer one, than which nothing can be more explicit, nothing more complete; but also the shorter one, in which it was particularly agreeable to me to understand that my sentiments and conduct were approved by Sextus. You have done me a great kindness; for I know that he loves me, and that he understands what is right. Your longer letter has relieved not me only, but all my family, from anxiety. I shall accordingly adopt your advice, and stay in Formianum; lest either my going to meet him in Rome may create observation; or if I neither see him here nor there, he may think that I try to avoid him. As to what you advise, that I should ask him to let me pay the same regard to Pompeius which I pay to him, you will see by the letter of Balbus and Oppius, of which I send you a copy, that I have already done so. I send also Cæsar's letter to them, written with great temper, for such a distempered state. If Cæsar does not grant me this, I perceive that you approve of my undertaking a negotiation for peace; in which I do not regard the hazard that attends it. For when so many dangers threaten us, why should I not compound for the most honourable? But I apprehend I shall bring some embarrassment upon Pompeius, and that he will be inclined to turn upon me "the appalling horror of the Gorgon's head." For our friend Cnæus has been strangely ambitious of a sovereignty like that of Sulla. I say it with confidence. He never was less 'secret. "Would you then," you say, "join such a man?" I follow him, believe me, from a sense of the benefits I have received, not from a love of his cause, as in the case of Milo; as in—but enough of this. "Is not then his cause a good one?" Yes, the very best: but it will be conducted, mind you, most foully. The first object is, to starve the city and all Italy by famine; then to lay waste and burn the country, and not to spare the property of the opulent. But, as I apprehend all the same calamities from this party; if there were not on the other side a sense of benefits received, I should think it more proper to bear at home whatever might happen. But I consider

* The original is a verse of Homer. The meaning here is, that he might have to encounter the frown of Pompeius, who was averse from any compromise. It is possible that some severity of countenance spoken of by Plutarch, as τὸ γρηγορὸν καὶ τὸ βασιλευδόν, may have given occasion to the application of this line to him.

† He was formerly spoken of as wanting openness. See book iv. letters 9 and 15.

myself under such obligations to him, that I dare not expose myself to the charge of ingratitude, however just an excuse for it you point out. About my triumph I agree with you, and easily and willingly give up all thoughts of it. I am uncommonly pleased with the hope that in the midst of our arrangements the season for sailing may creep on unobserved. "If only," as you say, "Pompeius is strong enough." He is stronger even than I thought. But whatever hope you may entertain of him, I engage that, if he prevails, he will leave no tile in Italy unbroken. "And will you then be his associate?" Against indeed my own judgment: and against the authority of all antiquity. I wish to get away, not so much to promote what is done there, as that I may not witness what is done here. For do not suppose that the madness of these people can be supportable, or confined to one kind: though nothing of this has escaped your penetration. When the laws, the judicial proceedings, and the senate, are taken away; neither private property nor the republic will be able to support the licentiousness, the boldness, the extravagance, the needs of so many needy men. Let us away then by any passage, though I submit this to your judgment; but by all means let us away. We shall soon know that which you wait for; what has been done at Brundisium. It gives me great pleasure, if indeed there is now any room for pleasure, that you say my conduct hitherto is approved by the good, at the same time that they know I have not left the country. I will endeavour to find out more particularly about Lentulus: I have entrusted this to Philotimus, a bold man, and more than enough attached to the senatorian party. In conclusion, you may perhaps be at a loss for a subject to write upon; for it is impossible at this time to write about anything else; and about this what more can now be said? But as both your wit supplies you (I speak forsooth as I think), and your affection, by which my wit likewise is sharpened; continue as you do, and write as much as you can. I am half angry that you do not invite me to Epirus, where I should not be a troublesome companion. But farewell. For as you must exercise and anoint yourself¹, so I must sleep; which your letter enables me to do!

Balbus and Oppius to M. Cicero.

THE counsels, not only of inconsiderable people, as we are, but even of the greatest men, are apt to be interpreted by the event; not by the intention. Yet relying on your goodness, we give you the best opinion we can upon the subject about which you wrote to us. And if it be not wise, at least it proceeds from honest minds, and the kindest regards. Unless we were assured from himself that Cæsar would do what in our judgment he ought to do; that as soon as he comes to Rome he will enter upon measures of reconciliation with Pompeius; we should cease to exhort you to take a part in this affair, in order that the whole may be effected more easily, and with more dignity, through you, who are connected with both parties. On the other hand, if we thought that Cæsar would not do so, but was desirous of engaging in war with Pompeius; we never would persuade you to bear arms against one who has shown you the greatest kindness; as we have always entreated you not to fight against Cæsar. But still, since we are rather able to guess than to know what Cæsar will do, we can only say, that it does not appear suitable to your dignity and known probity, being so attached to both, to bear arms against either; and we have no doubt but Cæsar will highly approve this, agreeably to his accustomed humanity. But, if you wish it, we will write to Cæsar, in order to ascertain more certainly what he will do in this affair: from whom if we receive an answer, we will immediately let you know our opinion; and promise you, that we will advise what seems to us most becoming your dignity, not what may be most beneficial to Cæsar's cause: and this, we believe, Cæsar will approve, according to his indulgence towards his friends.

² Which leads to remaining at Rome, instead of deserting one's country.

³ This alludes to the treatment of his quarant fever, for which Celsus likewise recommends walking and other exercise, and anointings. "Ambulationibus uti oportet, allisque exercitationibus, et unctionibus." — Lib. iii. 14.

Balbus to Cicero, Imperator.

I HOPE you are well. After I had despatched to you the joint letter with Oppius, I received one from Cæsar, of which I inclose a copy. From thence you may perceive how desirous he is of peace and of reconciliation with Pompeius; and how far he is from all cruelty; and I sincerely rejoice, as I ought, that he entertains such sentiments. With respect to yourself, and your integrity, and duty, I think, my Cicero, as you do, that it is impossible your reputation and attachment can permit you to bear arms against one from whom you profess to have received such kindness. That Cæsar will approve this I am confident, from his distinguished humanity; and I know for certain that he will be abundantly satisfied with you, provided you take no part in the war against him, and do not join his adversaries. And he will not only deem this sufficient in one of your high character; but, of his own accord, he has given me leave to absent myself from the army, that might have to act against Lentulus or Pompeius, to whom I am under great obligations: and he said, that he should be satisfied if, when I was called upon, I would undertake for him the business relating to the city; and that I was at liberty to do the same for them¹. Accordingly I am at this time conducting and supporting Lentulus's affairs at Rome; and I maintain towards them my duty, fidelity and gratitude. But, in truth, I consider the hope of agreement to be now again cast off, not entirely desperate; since Cæsar's disposition is such as we ought to desire. In this case I think, if it meets with your approbation, that you should write to him, and request from him a guard; as you did from Pompeius, with my approbation, at the time of Milo's trial. I will engage, if I know anything of Cæsar, that he will sooner consider your dignity than his own advantage. How prudently I may advise you I know not; but this I know, that whatever I write to you, I write from the purest affection and regard: for, so may I die without prejudice to Cæsar¹, as I esteem few equally dear to me as yourself. When you have come to any determination about this business², I wish you would write to me: for I am not a little earnest that you should be able, as you desire, to show your kindness towards both³. And this I trust you will do. Farewell.

Cæsar to Oppius and Cornelius⁴.

I AM very glad that you express in your letter how much you approve of what has been done at Cornifium. I shall willingly adopt your advice; and the more so, because of my own accord I had resolved to show every lenity, and to use my endeavours to conciliate Pompeius. Let us try by these means if we can regain the affections of all people, and render our victory lasting. Others, from their cruelty, have not been able to avoid the hatred of mankind, nor long to retain their victory; except L. Sulla alone, whom I do not mean to imitate. Let this be a new method of conquering, to fortify ourselves with kindness and liberality. How this may be done, some things occur to my own mind, and many others may be found. To this subject I request your attention. I have taken Cn. Magius, Pompeius's prefect. I accordingly put in practice my own principle, and immediately released him. Already two of Pompeius's prefects of engineers have fallen into my power, and have been released. If they are disposed to be grateful, they should exhort Pompeius to prefer my friendship to that of these people, who have always been the worst enemies to him and to me; by whose artifices it has happened that the republic has come into this condition.

LETTER VIII.

WHILE I was at dinner on the 14th, and it was late, Statius brought me a short letter from you. Respecting the inquiry you make about L. Torquatus, not only Lucius, but Aulus also, is gone¹, the former several days ago. I am concerned for what you mention about the assemblies of the Reatini, that there should be any seeds of proscription in the Sabine country. I had heard likewise² that many senators were at Rome. Can you tell why they ever left it³? It is the general opinion in these parts, rather from conjecture than from any message, or letter, that Cæsar will be at Formiæ the 22d of March. Here now should I like to have that Minerva of Homer, who took the form of Mentor, to whom I might say, "Mentor, how shall I go; or how shall I accost him?"⁴ Nothing more difficult ever occurred to me. I think of it however; and at least shall not, as sometimes happens, be taken by surprise. But take care of your health,—for I think yesterday was your bad day.

⁵ The expression "likewise" probably refers to a previous letter from Atticus, and means that Cicero had heard this before he received Atticus's account.

LETTER IX.

I RECEIVED three letters from you on the 16th. They were dated the 12th, 13th, and 14th. I shall, therefore, reply to them in their order. I agree with you, that it is best to remain in Formianum; also about the passage by the Adriatic sea; and, as I mentioned to you before, I will try if I can get his consent to my taking no part in public affairs. What you approve, that I told you I forget the precious conduct and errors of our friend, it is even so. Nay, I remember not those very circumstances which you mention of his misconduct towards me. So much do I desire that my gratitude for his kindness may overpower all sense of his ill-treatment. Let us do then as you advise, and recollect ourselves. For I philosophise as soon as I get into the country; and in my walks I do not cease to meditate upon the subjects I mentioned to you¹. But some of them are very difficult to determine. Respecting the principal citizens, be it as you please; but you know that saying, "Dionysius in Corinth²." Titinius' son is with Cæsar. But what you seem to fear, that your advice may displease me; this is so far from being the case, that your opinion and your letters are the only thing that give me pleasure. Therefore continue, as you profess, to write to me whatever comes into your mind. Nothing can be more acceptable to me. I come now to the next letter. You are not rightly informed about the number of Pompeius' soldiers. Clodia mentioned more by one half. The story too about the ships that were destroyed, is not true. When you commend the consuls, I also commend their intentions, though I blame their conduct: for owing to their dispersion, the negotiation for peace is prevented, which I was meditating. Accordingly, I have sent back to you by Philotimus the treatise of Demetrius upon Concord. I cannot doubt but a most destructive war hangs over us, the first operation of which will be felt in the want of provisions. Yet I am vexed that I have no part in this war, notwithstanding such a load of wickedness will attend it; for, whereas the not supporting a parent is criminal; our chiefs design to destroy that most venerable and sacred parent, their country, by famine. And this I fear, not from conjecture, but from the conversations at which I have been present. All this fleet from Alexandria, Colchis, Tyre, Sidon, Aradus, Cyprus, Pamphylia, Lycia, Rhodes, Chios, Byzantium, Leabus, Smyrna, Miletus, Cos, is collected for the purpose of intercepting the supplies of Italy, and of occupying the provinces from whence they are drawn. Then, in what wrath will he³ come! especially against those who wish best to their country; as if he had been deserted by those people whom in fact he deserted. In my doubt therefore what I ought to do, my gratitude towards him has great weight. Were it not for this, I should think it better to perish within my country, than in saving my country to ruin it. Respecting the northern parts⁴, I think with you; and fear that Epirus may suffer. But what place in Greece do you suppose will escape being plundered? For he professes openly, and holds out to his soldiers, that even in his bounties he will show himself the superior. You very justly advise me, when I see Cæsar, not to address him with over civility, but rather to maintain my dignity. And so I shall certainly do. After our meeting, I think of going to Arpinum; for I would not be absent when he comes; nor should I like to be running backwards and forwards on so wretched a road. I hear, as you mention, that Bibulus arrived, and returned again the 14th. In the third letter you say that you were expecting Philotimus. He left me on the 15th. This was the reason that the answer, which I wrote immediately upon the receipt of your letter, was later in reaching you. Respecting Domitius, I imagine, as you say, that he is in Cossanum, and that his intention is not known. That base and sordid man⁵, who says that the consular comitia may be held by the prætor, is the same that he always was in the republic. This is the real meaning of what Cæsar writes in the letter of which I sent you a copy⁶, that he wishes to avail himself of my advice: well, suppose this to be a general expression, my influence,—this is absurd; but I imagine he pretends this with regard to some opinions of the senators: my dignity, meaning perhaps the opinion of one of consular rank: at last comes my assistance in everything. I began to suspect from your letter, that his intention was what I have hinted, or not very different. For it is of great consequence to him that the business should not come to an interregnum⁷. If the consuls are created by the prætor, he gains his point. But in our augural books we read not only that the consuls, but even the prætors, cannot lawfully be created by a prætor, and that it never has been done. In the case of consuls it is not allowed, because a higher command cannot be instituted by an inferior one: and in the case of prætors, because they are elected as assistants to the consuls, who are of superior authority. He will be very likely to refer this to me, and not to rest satisfied with the opinion of Galba, Scævola, Cassius, Antonius⁸. "Then may the wide earth gape to receive me!" You see what a storm hangs over me. I will send you the names of the senators who have passed over, when I have ascertained them. You are quite right about the supplies of corn, which cannot possibly be managed without subsidies⁹; nor is it without reason that you fear those who are about him, full of demands; and tended, among which was situated Atticus's property in Epirus.

² Inserted after letter 6 of this book.

⁴ It is to be supposed that these were augurs as well as Cicerone, and in Cæsar's interests. It belonged to the augurs to determine such cases.

¹ See the 4th letter of this book.

⁴ The northern parts of Greece seem here to be in-dread an iniquitous war. I should be glad to see our friend Trebatius, though, as you say, he has no hope of anything good. Press him to make haste: for it will be convenient that he should come before Cæsar's arrival. Respecting Lanuinum, as soon as I heard that Phameas was dead, I wished, if there should ever be a republic, that one of my friends might buy it. But of you, who are most especially mine, I never thought. For I knew that you used to inquire at how many years' purchase, and what is the productiveness of the soil; and had seen your book of accounts^d not only at Rome, but at Delos. However, though it is very pretty, yet I should value it lower than it was valued in the consulship of Marcellinus, when I thought, on account of the house which I then had at Antium, that those gardens would be pleasanter to me, and less expensive, than the refitting my villa at Tusculum. I offered 500 sester tia (4000*l.*), through a surety to whom he might surrender it, when it was to be sold at Antium: but he would not accept it. Now however I imagine everything of that kind is lowered on account of the scarcity of money. It will be most convenient for me, or rather for us, if you purchase it. Take care not to undervalue his absurdities^e. The place is exceedingly beautiful: though I look upon all these things as already devoted to destruction. I have answered your three letters; but am expecting others. For hitherto it is your letters that have supported me. Dated on the Liberalia^f.

LETTER X.

I HAVE nothing to tell you; for I have heard no news, and I answered all your letters yesterday. But while my anxiety not only deprives me of sleep, but does not even suffer me to be awake without great uneasiness, I have determined to write I know not what, upon no particular subject, that I may, as it were, converse with you; in which alone I find consolation. I seem to have lost my reason from the beginning; and this one consideration vexes me, that while Pompeius was sinking, or rather rushing to destruction, I should not in all events have accompanied him, like one of his troop. I saw him on the 19th of January full of alarm; and from that day I perceived what course he would take. He has never pleased me since, nor has he ever ceased to commit one error after another. In the mean time he has never written to me; and has thought of nothing but flight. In short, as in affairs of love we are disgusted by a want of cleanliness, of sense, or of delicacy; so the baseness of his flight, and his neglect, turned away my affection: for his conduct has been void of all merit, that should induce me to join him. But now my affection again rises up; now I cannot bear to be without him; now neither books, nor study, nor philosophy, afford me any relief; so that, like Plato's bird^g, I look upon the sea day and night, and long to take my flight. I pay, I pay the penalty of my folly: yet what folly have I committed? What have I not done with due deliberation? For, had I no object besides flight, I might have fled with all readiness; but I shuddered at the idea of a cruel and extensive war, of which people do not yet see the wretchedness. What threats are held out to the towns! and to good men by name! and in short to all who stay behind! How often does he repeat, "Sulla was able, shall not I be able?" Besides, this stuck with me: Tarquinius acted ill, who excited Porsena and Octavius Mamilius against his country: Coriolanus most undutifully, who solicited succour from the Volsci: Themistocles nobly, who chose rather to die: and Hippas, the son of Pisistratus, was branded with infamy, who fell in the battle of Marathon bearing arms against his country. But Sulla, but Marius, but Cinna, did well, perhaps even rightly; yet what could be more cruel, more destructive, than their victory? A war of this kind I wished to avoid; and the more so, because I saw that still greater cruelties were devised and prepared. Should I, whom some have called the preserver, the father of that city, bring against it the forces of the Getæ, and Armenians, and Colchians? Should I bring famine upon my fellow-citizens, ruin upon Italy? I considered that this^h man in the first place was mortal; then, that he might be destroyed in many ways: but I thought the city, and people, ought, as far as in us lies, to be preserved to immortality. At the same time a certain hope presented itself to me, that something might be agreed upon, rather than that either the one should admit such a degree of wickedness, or the other such a degree of profligacy. Now the general concern is altered, and my particular concern is altered with it. To me, as it is expressed in one of your letters, it seems as if the sun had fallen out of the world. As they say of the sick, that while there is life, there is hope; so I, as long as Pompeius was in Italy, did not cease to hope. This, this it was that deceived me; and, to speak the truth, my age already declining from continual labours towards a state of repose, soothed me with the charm of domestic life. Now, though the attempt be attended with danger, I certainly will attempt to fly away from hence. I ought perhaps to have done it sooner; but the circumstances I have mentioned delayed me, and above all your authority. For when I got to this place I opened the bundle of your letters, which I have under my seal, and keep with the greatest care. In one, that was dated January 23, I find it thus: "But let us see what Cnæus does, and in what direction his designs flow. If he should leave Italy, he will act altogether wrong, and in my judgment inadvisedly; and in

of Syracuse, compared himself to a bird longing to make its escape.

^h This is generally understood of Cæsar; I rather understand it of Pompeius: the sense being, that Cicero was not so to support Pompeius, who might die at any time, as to ruin his country, which ought to be preserved for ever. And this he gives as a reason for not immediately joining Pompeius. He besides still cherished hopes of peace; and that neither Pompeius would be so wicked as to destroy his country, nor Cæsar so profligate as to enslave it. But now that they had thrown off the mask, and shown their real intentions, and extinguished all ideas of accommodation, the whole state of affairs was changed, and Cicero's duty changed likewise.

^d In the original is digamma, the signification of which is uncertain; but the context leads to the interpretation I have given.

^e That is, the extravagant alterations which Phameas had made.

^f The festival of Bacchus, which was celebrated the 18th of March.

^g Plato, wishing to get away from Dionysius the tyrant that case our plans must be changed." This you write four days after I left the city. Again, on the 25th of January: "Provided our Cneus does not relinquish Italy as inadvisedly as he has relinquished the city." The same day you send a second letter, in which you distinctly reply to my questions. It is thus: "I come now to your consultation. If Cneus leaves Italy, I think you should return to the city: for what end is there of travelling about?" This struck me forcibly,—and I now see it to be even so, that a boundless war is united with a wretched flight; which you represent as a travelling. There follows an oracular opinion on the 27th of January: "If Pompeius remains in Italy, and no agreement is made, I think there will be a protracted war; but if he leaves Italy, I apprehend that a war is prepared, which will hereafter be interminable." In this war I am obliged to be a partaker, a companion, and an assistant; a war interminable, and with fellow-citizens! Then on the 7th of February, when you began already to hear more of Pompeius's design, you conclude one of your letters in this manner: "I do not indeed advise, if Pompeius leaves Italy, that you should also run away; for you will do it with great risk, and will not benefit the republic; which you may benefit hereafter, if you remain." Who that had any love for his country, or any public spirit, would not be moved by such advice, upon the authority of a prudent man and a friend? Further, on the 11th of February, you again reply to my inquiries thus: "What you ask me, whether I think preferable, a flight in which I preserve my fidelity, or a stay which must be relinquished? I certainly think at present that a sudden departure and precipitate journey would be useless to Cneus himself, and hazardous to you; and I think it better that your friends should be dispersed, and in places of observation: and in truth I think it disgraceful for us to entertain any design of flight." This disgraceful thing our friend Cneus meditated two years ago; so long has his mind dwelt upon Sulla, and upon proscriptions. Afterwards when, as I imagine, you had written to me something in a more generous strain, and I had supposed some expressions to mean that I should quit Italy¹, you distinctly reprobate this on the 14th of February: "I assure you I never meant in any letter to express that if Cneus went out of Italy, you should go with him; or if I expressed it, I must have been, I do not say an inconsistent man, but a mad man." In another part of the same letter: "Nothing is left for him but flight; but I by no means think, or have ever thought, that it was your duty to accompany him." But this whole consideration you unfold more particularly in a letter dated the 12th of February: "If M. Lepidus and L. Volcatius remain, I think you ought to remain; yet so, that if Pompeius is in safety and makes a stand anywhere, you may leave this ghastly troop², and rather suffer yourself to be defeated in battle with Pompeius, than reign with Cæsar among that rabble, to which it is evident they will be reduced." You then use many arguments in support of this opinion; and in conclusion you say, "What if Lepidus and Volcatius go away? I am completely at a loss: and whatever happens therefore, and whatever you do, I shall think that we ought to be satisfied with it." If you then doubted, now at least you do not doubt, as they remain. Then, at the very time of his flight, February 25: "In the mean time I do not doubt but you will remain in Formianum; for you can there with most convenience wait for what may happen." On the 1st of March, when he had already been four days at Brundisium: "We shall then be able to deliberate, while the cause is not indeed whole and entire, but certainly less infringed, than if you threw yourself away with him." Again, March 4, when your agrus was coming on, in consequence of which you wrote very briefly, you add however: "To-morrow I will write more, and reply to all your observations: so much however I will say, that I do not repent of the advice I gave about your stay; and, though it must be attended with great anxiety, yet as I think it less objectionable than your going, I continue in the same opinion, and am glad that you have remained." But when I was uneasy, and afraid lest I might have acted unbecomingly; on the 3d of March you say, "Nevertheless, I am not sorry that you are not with Pompeius. Hereafter, if there is occasion, it will not be difficult; and whenever it is done, it will be very gratifying to him. But I must add, that if Cæsar goes on to act, as he has begun, with candour, moderation, and prudence, I shall think again, and consider more deliberately what is best to be done." On the 9th of March you write also that our friend Peduceus approves of my remaining quiet; and his opinion has great weight with me. With these letters of yours I comfort myself by thinking that hitherto I have not done wrong. Do you only defend your own opinion. With regard to myself it is unnecessary; but I want to have others know it. If only I have not erred, I will take care of the rest. Let me have your encouragement, and assist me altogether with your judgment. Here nothing is yet heard about Cæsar's return. So much at least I have gained by this letter, that I have read over all yours, and in so doing have found consolation.

LETTER XI.

You know our friend Lentulus is at Puteoli. Upon hearing this from a passenger, who said that he recognised him on the Appian road, where he was travelling in a litter partly opened; however improbable it might be, yet I sent a servant to Puteoli to ascertain the fact, and sent a letter to him. He found him just secluding himself in his villa, from whence he wrote back to me full of gratitude to Cæsar, and saying that he had delivered to C. Cæcilius instructions for me about his future plans: him I expect to-day, that is, the 20th of March. Matius also came to me the 19th,—a man, as he has appeared to me, temperate and prudent; and has always been supposed to be in favour of peace. How much he seemed to disapprove these proceedings! How much to dread that ghastly troop, as you call them! In a long conversation which I had with him, I showed him Cæsar's letter to me, of which I before sent you a copy, and asked him to explain to me what it was meant by saying that he wished to avail himself of my advice, my influence, my dignity, my assistance in everything³.

³ See letter 9 of this book.

He replied, that he had no doubt he wanted my assistance and influence to promote an accommodation. Would that it were possible for me to effect, or help forward, any measure of public utility in this wretched state of the country! Matrius likewise was persuaded that he was so disposed, and promised that he would himself advise it. Yesterday Crassipes was with me, who said that he had come from Brundisium the 6th of March, and had left Pompeius there; which was the report also of those who had come from thence on the 8th. And all agreed (amongst whom was Crassipes also, who would listen with more prudence¹) that they used threatening language, unfriendly towards the principal citizens, hostile to the towns, mere proscriptions, mere Sullas²: that Lucceius, that all Greece, that Theophanes also, talked in this manner. Yet in these people is all our hope of safety; and I watch in my mind, and take no rest, and in order to avoid the calamities at home, am wishing to be with persons most unlike myself. For what excess do you suppose Scipio, and Faustus, and Libo³, will not commit; whose creditors are said to be meeting⁴? And, if they are successful, how will they harass the citizens! But what distant views do they relate of our Cneus? that he thinks of going to Egypt, and Arabia, and Mesopotamia, and has laid aside all idea of Spain. Such stories are monstrous; but perhaps they are not true. Assuredly things are both ruinous here, and there by no means well disposed. I am already wishing to hear from you. Since my retreat from the city, there has never been on my part any interruption of our correspondence. I send you a copy of my letter to Cæsar, by which I hope to produce some effect.

Cicero, Imperator, to Cæsar, Imperator.

UPON reading your letter⁵, which I received by my friend Furnius, relative to my being in the city, I was not so much surprised at your wishing to avail yourself of my advice, and dignity; but I asked myself what you meant by my influence and assistance. And I was led by my hopes to this conclusion; that agreeably to your admirable and singular prudence, I supposed you might wish some steps to be taken for the tranquillity, the peace, the union of the citizens: and for that purpose I thought my character and person sufficiently suited. Which if it be so, and if you are touched with any regard for protecting my friend Pompeius, and reconciling him with yourself and the republic, you will indeed find nobody more ready than I am in such a cause; having always been to him, and to the senate, as soon as I could, the counsellor of peace. Nor have I by taking up arms had any part in the war; but have thought that you were injured in it, and that unfriendly and envious persons were resisting the honour⁶ which had been granted you by the favour of the Roman people. But as at that time I not only supported your dignity, but also got others to assist you; so now am I greatly interested for the dignity of Pompeius. It is now some years since I selected you two, whom I might particularly cultivate, and with whom I might be, as I am, in the strictest friendship. I therefore request of you, or rather I beg and entreat you with all earnestness, that among your great cares you would allot some time also to this consideration, that by your favour I may be enabled to sustain the part of a good man, grateful and dutiful in the remembrance of the greatest benefits⁷. If this concerned myself only, I should nevertheless hope to obtain it from you; but, as I conceive, it concerns both your own plighted faith, and the republic, that out of a few I should be reserved by your means, as one particularly suited to renew the harmony of you two, and of the citizens. Though I have before thanked you on account of Lentulus, whom you have saved, as he did me; yet upon reading the letter, which he wrote to me full of gratitude for your liberality and kindness⁸, I considered myself to have received from you the same benefit you have conferred upon him. If then you perceive that I am grateful towards him, give me the power of being so likewise towards Pompeius⁹.

LETTER XI¹⁰

I AM not sorry for what you say about my letter¹¹ being made public; and have even myself allowed several people to take copies of it. For after what has happened, and still threatens us, I should be well pleased to have my sentiments recorded concerning a peace. But in recommending this, especially to such a man, I thought there was no readier means of moving him, than by affirming that the measure, to which I exhorted him, was worthy of his prudence. And if I have spoken of his prudence in terms of admiration while I was calling upon him to save his country, I am not afraid of appearing to flatter a man, at whose feet I would willingly have thrown myself in such a cause. But where it is said, that you would allot some time; this is not that he should consider about peace; but about me, and my duty¹². For when I affirm that I have not engaged in the war, although it is evident from the fact, yet I added it for the purpose of giving weight to my persuasion. And it is with the same view that I approve his cause. But why is this brought forward now? Would that any good had followed! Nay, I should be glad to have my letter read in the public assembly; since Pompeius himself made public his own letter to him, in which he says, *for your most distinguished conduct*¹³. More distinguished than his own? than that of Africanus? Such was the current of the times. Even you two⁷, so respected, go to meet him at the fifth mile-stone. What? to meet him on his return from whence? doing what? or purposing to do what? With what additional spirit will he trust in his cause, when he sees you, and others like you, greeting him not only with their numbers, but with cheerful looks? Are we then to blame⁸? I do not mean at all to accuse you: but the marks which should distinguish real good-will from mere pretence are strangely confounded. But what decrees of the senate do I foresee? I am speaking however more openly than I had intended. I mean to be at Arpinum the last day of the month, and thence to visit my several villas, which I despair of seeing afterwards.

LETTER XII.

WHILE I was reading your letter on the 20th of March, I received one from Lepta, informing me that Pompeius was surrounded, and that even the passage out of the harbour was occupied with rafts. I cannot bear to think or write the rest for weeping. I send you a copy of it. Wretched as we are! why did we not all follow his destiny? The same intelligence is brought from Matus and Trebatius, who met with Cæsar's messengers at Minturnæ. I am distracted with grief, and already envy the fate of Mucius⁹. But how honourable, how clear are your counsels! how well considered, respecting my journey by land, my passage by sea, my meeting and conversation with Cæsar! All is at once honourable and cautious. And how kind, how generous, how brotherly, is your invitation to Epirus! I am surprised about Dionysius, who was treated by me with more honour than Panætius was by Scipio, and yet has most foully insulted this present state of my fortune. I hate the man, and will hate him, and wish I could punish him; but his own humour will punish him sufficiently. Now especially I beg you to consider what I ought to do. An army of the Roman people invests Cn. Pompeius! keeps him inclosed with a trench and rampart! prevents his escape! Do I live? And is the city standing? Do the prætors continue to pronounce judgment? Do the ædiles prepare the public games? Do substantial men continue to register their interest? And^b do I myself sit idle? Should I madly endeavour to go thither, to implore the faith of the towns? The honest will not follow me; the inconsiderate will laugh at me; and those who are eager for a change, especially being armed and victorious, will use violence, and lay hands upon me. What think you then? Have you any counsel for the remains of this wretched life? I am grieved, and vexed; while some think me prudent, or fortunate, in not having gone with him. But I think otherwise. For though I never wished to be his companion in victory, I should desire to be so in adversity. Why should I now request your letters, your prudence, or kindness? The thing is over. Nothing can now help me, who have not even anything left to wish for, but that he may be delivered by some compassion of the enemy^c. I suspect that the account of the rafts is not true. Else what is it that Dolabella means in this letter, which he sent from Brundisium the 13th of March, calling it the good fortune of Cæsar, that Pompeius should be on his flight; and that he would sail with the first wind? which is very different from those letters, of which I before sent you copies. Here they talk of mere cruelties. But there is no later or better authority than that of Dolabella.

LETTER XIII.

I RECEIVED your letter on the 22d, in which you defer all counsel to that time when we shall have learned what has been done. In truth so it must be; nor in the interval can anything be determined, or even planned; although the recent letter of Dolabella encourages me to resume my former considerations: for, on the 18th there was a favourable wind, of which I suppose he would take advantage. The collection of your^d opinions was not brought together for the sake of lamentation, but rather for my consolation. For I was not so much distressed with these calamities, as with the suspicion of my own fault, or folly: these thoughts I now dismiss, since my conduct and counsels have the sanction of your judgment. When you say that my being under such great obligations to him, is more a matter of acknowledgement on my part than of desert on his; it is so. I have always extolled to the utmost what he did; and the more, that he might not suppose I harboured the remembrance of what had passed before^e. Which however well I may remember, yet now it becomes me to follow the pattern of his conduct at that time^f. He gave me no assistance when it was in his power; and afterward he became friendly, indeed extremely so, from what reason I know not. I will therefore do the same to him. Moreover, this is alike in both of us, that we have been led into error by the very same people^g. I only wish I were able to assist him as much as he was able to assist me. What he did however is most grateful to me. But I neither know in what manner I can now help him; nor, if I could, should I think it right to do so while he is preparing such a deadly war. I would only avoid giving him offence by staying here. I can neither bear to see what you may already anticipate in your mind, nor to ^c Cicero probably received Dolabella's letter subsequently to his writing the above. This may, perhaps, be intimated by the expression his literis, which I have therefore endeavoured to preserve in the translation: the letter, or a copy of it, might have been inclosed.

^d See letter 10 of this book.

^e When Pompeius did not exert himself as he might, to prevent Cicero's banishment.

^f When, after neglecting Cicero's interests in the first instance, he afterwards was active in his recall, as he goes on to explain.

^g Meaning probably Bibulus, Lucceius, and others, who had formerly been envious and jealous of Cicero, [see book iv. letter 5.] and had more recently led on Pompeius to his present fortune, and then deserted him.

⁷ Perhaps Atticus and Sext. Peduceus. See book vii. letter 13.

^a This appears to be asked as by Atticus and Peduceus.

^b Q. Mucius Scaevola was killed in a former civil war by order of Marius. This is before alluded to. See book viii. letter 3.

^c That is, do things go on as usual? or are not all orders of men eager to vindicate the country from such monstrous proceedings? Not unlike to this is that of Catullus, "Quid est Catulle, quid moraris emori?"

take a part in those calamities. I have been the slower in removing, because it is difficult to make up one's mind to a voluntary departure without any hope of returning. For I perceive that Cæsar is so well provided with infantry, with cavalry, with fleets, with auxiliaries from Gaul; which latter Mælius, a little ostentatiously I suspect, but certainly, estimated at 10,000 foot and 6000 horse, to be furnished at their own expense for ten years: but, supposing this to be an exaggeration, he has certainly great forces; and he will have for their support, not subsidies, like Pompeius^b, but the property of the citizens. Add to this the confidence of the man; add the weakness of all those attached to the republic; who, because they think Pompeius may with reason be angry with them, therefore hate the game, as you call it; would it were such! You say too that one had observed, "That fellow sits idle," because he had professed more than he performed^c; and generally those who once loved him, love him no longer; but the towns and country people are afraid of him, and hitherto are fond of Cæsar: from all this, I say, he is so well provided, that even if he should not be able to conquer, yet how he can himself be conquered I do not see. But I fear no fascination^d from this man so much as the persuasion of necessity. "For you must know," says Plato, "that the requests of tyrants are blended with necessity." I see you do not approve of those places which have no harbour; and indeed they did not please me; but I could be there without observation, and with a trusty attendance; which if I could have at Brundisium, I should like it better. But there it is impossible to be concealed. But, as you say, when we shall have learned^e, I am not anxious to exculpate myself to your good men. For what dinners does Sextus inform me they are giving and receiving! How luxurious! How joyous! But be these people as good as they may, they are not better than ourselves: they might move me if they had more courage^f. I was mistaken about Phæmas's Lanuinum^g; I was dreaming of his Trojanum. It was for that I offered 500 sestertia (4000*l.*) But the other is worth more. I should wish however that you might buy it, if I saw any hope of enjoying it. What strange things are daily reported, you will know from the note^h enclosed in my letter. Our friend Lentulus is at Puteoli pining with grief, as Cæcilius relates. What should he do? He dreads a repetition of the disgrace of Corfinium: he now thinks he has done enough for Pompeius, and is moved by Cæsar's kindness; but yet is more moved by the actual state of affairs. Can you bear this? Everything

^b See letter 9 of this book.

^c I give this translation of an obscure, and perhaps faulty, passage, not without great hesitation. I propose to point the Latin thus: "Oderunt, ut tu scribis, ludum; ac vellem! Sorbis quidem hic significasset, Sedet tibi; quia plus ostenderat, quam fecit."

^d Cicero here employs a Greek word, which is probably copied from an expression of Atticus, to which this is meant as a reply.

^e This refers to what is said in the beginning of this letter.

^f If they showed more courage in support of the republic.

^h Perhaps this may mean Lepia's report, which Cicero had sent to Atticus with the preceding letter.

is wretched, but nothing more wretched than this; that Pompeius has sent M. Magius to propose conditions of peace, and is yet besieged, which I did not at first believe; but I have received a letter from Balbus, of which I send you a copy. Read it, I beseech you, and that paragraph of Balbus himself, the excellent Balbus^o! to whom our friend Cæsar gave a piece of ground to erect a villa; whom he often distinguished by a preference to any of us. So, he is sadly distressed! But that you may not have to read the same thing twice, I refer you to the letter itself. As to any hope of peace, I have none. Dolabella, in his letter of March 15, speaks of nothing but war. I must remain then in that same wretched and desperate determination^p, since nothing can be more wretched than this^q.

Balbus to Cicero, Imperator.

I HAVE received a short letter from Cæsar, of which I subjoin a copy. By the shortness of it you may judge how greatly he is occupied, who writes so briefly upon so important a subject. If there should be any further news, I will immediately write to you.

"Cæsar to Oppius, and to Cornelius".

I ARRIVED at Brundisium the 9th of March. I pitched my camp close to the wall. Pompeius is in Brundisium. He has sent M. Magius to me to treat of peace. I made such reply as seemed proper. This I wished you immediately to know. When I entertain hope of accomplishing anything towards an agreement, I will immediately inform you.^r

How do you imagine, my Cicero, that I am now distressed, after being again brought to have some hope of peace, lest anything should prevent their agreement? For, in my absence all I can do is to wish. If I were there, I might perhaps seem to be of some use. Now I am in a cruel state of expectation.

LETTER XIV.

I SENT you on the 24th a copy of Balbus's letter to me, and of Cæsar's to him; and the very same day I received one from Q. Pedius at Capua, informing me that Cæsar had written to him the 14th of March in the following terms. "Pompeius keeps within the town. We are encamped before the gates. We are attempting a great work, which must occupy many days on account of the depth of the sea; but there is nothing better to be done: we are constructing piers from each extremity of the port, so as either to oblige him to transport immediately the forces he has at Brundisium, or to prevent him from getting out." Where is the peace, about which Balbus professed himself to be so distressed? Can anything be more bitter? anything more cruel? And some confidently relate that he talks of avenging the sufferings of Cn. Carbo, and M. Brutus^s, and of all those who had felt the cruelty of Sulla while Pompeius was his associate: that Curio under his command did nothing which Pompeius had not done under the command of Sulla: that to serve his own views he had recalled those only, who by the former laws¹ were not liable to banishment; but that Pompeius had recalled from exile the very traitors to their country: that he complained of Milo's being driven out by violence²: that, however, he should punish nobody but those who were found in arms. This was contradicted by one Bæbius who came from Curio on the 13th, a man not without some eloquence; but who may not say so to anybody³? I am quite at a loss what to do. I imagine Cæsus is now gone from thence. What is really the case, we must know in two days' time. I have heard nothing from you, nor is Anteros⁴ arrived, who might bring a letter from you. But it is no wonder; for what can we write? Nevertheless I omit no day.

After I had finished my letter, I received one, before it was light, from Lepta at Capua, informing me that Pompeius had embarked from Brundisium the 15th of March; and that Cæsar was to be at Capua the 26th.

LETTER XV.

AFTER I had sent my letter to inform you that Cæsar was to be at Capua on the 26th, I received one from Capua, saying that he would be with Curio in Albanum the 28th. As soon as I have seen him I shall go to Arpinum. If he grants me the permission I ask, I shall accede to his terms; if not, I shall make terms for myself⁵. He has, as he wrote to me, placed single legions at Brundisium, Tarentum, and Sipontum. He seems to be closing up the passages by sea; and yet himself to look rather to Greece than to Spain. But these are more distant considerations. At present I am worried with the idea of meeting him; for he is just here, and I dread his first steps. For I imagine he will want a decree of the senate, he will want a warrant of the augurs (and I shall be hurried away⁶, or shall be exposed to great vexation if I absent myself), either for the prætor to propose the consuls, or to nominate a dictator; neither of which is consistent with law. But if Sulla could procure his own appointment to the dictatorship by an interrex, why may not Cæsar? I cannot resolve the difficulty, unless by suffering under the one the punishment of Q. Mucius, or under the other that of L. Scipio⁷. By the time you read this, our interview will perhaps have taken place—"Bear up, my heart, you have borne a severer

trial⁸." No, not that which was peculiarly my own. For then there was hope of an early return; there was a general complaint: now I am anxious to get away, and any idea of returning never enters my mind. Besides, there is not only no complaint among the provincial towns, and country people; but on the contrary they fear Pompeius, as cruel and exasperated. Yet nothing is to me a greater source of sorrow than that I should have remained; nor anything which I more desire, than to fly away; not so much to be the companion of his warfare, as of his flight. You deferred giving any opinion till such time as we should know what had been done at Brundisium. Now then we know, nevertheless my doubts continue. For I can scarcely hope that he will grant me the permission I want, though I produce many just reasons for it. But I will immediately send you an exact account of all that passes between us. Do you strive with all affection to assist me with your care and prudence. He comes so soon, that I shall not be able even to see Trebatius⁹, as I had appointed. Everything must be done without preparation. But as Mentor says to Telemachus,—"You would provide one thing, but the Deity provides another." Whatever I do, you shall immediately know it. As for any despatches from Cæsar to the consuls and to Pompeius, about which you ask, I have none. What Ægypta brought, I sent to you before on my way hither; from which I think the despatches may be understood. Philippus is at Naples, Lentulus at Puteoli; respecting Domitius continue to inquire, as you do, where he is, and what are his intentions. When you say that I have expressed myself about Dionysius with more asperity than is consistent with my disposition, you must know that I am one of the old school, and imagined you would feel this insult with more indignation than myself. For besides that I thought you ought to be moved at the ill-treatment I might have received from anybody, this man has in some measure injured you also by his misconduct towards me. But how much you value this I leave to your own judgment; nor in this do I wish to impose any burden upon you. For my own part, I always thought him a little crazy; but now I also think him disingenuous, and wicked; yet not more an enemy to me than to himself. You have been properly careful towards Philargyrus; you certainly had a just and good cause; that I was myself deserted, rather than that I deserted him¹⁰. After I had delivered my letter, on the 25th, the servant, whom I had sent to Trebatius also, as well as to Matus, brought back a letter, of which the following is a copy.

Matus and Trebatius to Cicero, Imperator.

AFTER we had left Capua, we heard on our road that Pompeius had gone from Brundisium the 17th of March with all his troops; that Cæsar had ⁸ The original is taken from Homer. Cicero alludes to his former sufferings in his banishment.

⁹ So I read it, agreeably to letter 9 of this book, wherein Cicero expressed his wish to see Trebatius before Cæsar's arrival.

¹⁰ This probably means Dionysius, on whose subject Atticus might have spoken to Philargyrus in exculpation of Cicero's conduct towards him. It is uncertain if this Dionysius be the same that is represented to have run off entered into the town the day following, and, having harangued the people, had proceeded from thence towards Rome, and hoped to be in the city before the first of April, and then, after staying there a few days, to set out for Spain. We have thought it advisable, having for certain this account of Caesar's motions, to send your servant back, that you might know it as soon as possible. We will attend to your instructions, and execute them as occasion requires. Trebatius Scævola hopes to be with you in time^d.

Since writing our letter we have been told that Caesar means to pass the 25th of March at Beneventum, the 26th at Capua, the 27th at Sinuessa. We believe this may be depended upon.

LETTER XVI.

THOUGH I have nothing particular to tell you, yet, not to omit any day, I send this letter. They say that Caesar will stop on the 27th at Sinuessa. I received a letter from him the 26th, in which he now expects every kind of assistance from me, not simply my assistance, as in his former letter. Upon my writing to commend his clemency in the affair of Cornificus, he replied in the following terms:—

Caesar, Imperator, to Cicero, Imperator.

You rightly conceive of me (for I am well known to you) that nothing can be further from my disposition than cruelty. And while I have great pleasure in the transaction itself, I rejoice with triumph that what I have done meets with your approbation. Nor does it disturb me that those whom I have set at liberty are said to have gone away in order again to make war upon me; for I wish nothing more than that I should be like myself, and they like themselves. I should be glad to have you in the city, that on all occasions I may avail myself of your advice and every kind of assistance, as I have been used to do. Let me assure you that nothing can be more agreeable to me than your Dolabella. To him accordingly I shall owe this favour^e; for he cannot do otherwise, such is his kindness, his feeling, and his affection towards me.

LETTER XVII.

I WRITE this on the 28th, on which day I expect Trebatius. From his report, and from Matius's letter, I shall consider how I am to regulate my conversation with him^f. O sad time! And I have no doubt but he will press me to go to the city; for he has ordered it to be publicly announced even at Formiæ, that he wishes to have a full attendance of the senate on the first of April. Must I then refuse him? But why anticipate? I will immediately write you an account of everything. From what passes between us I shall determine whether I should go to Arpinum or elsewhere. I wish to invest my young Cicero with the manly robe^g, and with some valuable books from Cicero's library.—Ep. Fam. xiii. 77.

^e Of persuading Cicero to go to Rome.

^f Caesar.

^g This was usually done at the age of seventeen.

I think of doing it there. Consider, I beg you, what course I should take afterwards; for anxiety has made me stupid. I should be glad to know if you have received from Curius any account of Tiro^h. For Tiro himself has written to me in such a manner as makes me fearful how he may be; and those who come from thence only say so much, that he is going on wellⁱ. In the midst of great cares this also troubles me; for in this state of things his assistance and fidelity would be extremely useful.

LETTER XVIII.

I HAVE done both according to your advice; having ordered my discourse so that he should rather think well of me than thank me^j; and having adhered to my intention of not going to the city. I was mistaken in supposing that he would easily be persuaded: I never knew anybody less so. He said that he stood condemned by my resolution; and that others would be slower to comply, if I refused to attend. I replied, that their case was different from mine^k. After a good deal of discussion, "Come, then," said he, "and propose terms of peace." "At my own discretion," said I. "Have I," said he, "any right to prescribe to you?" "This," I replied, "is what I shall propose: that it is not agreeable to the senate that troops should be sent to Spain, or that an army should be transported into Greece; and I shall lament at some length the situation of Pompeius." Then he—"But I do not like that to be said." "So I supposed," said I; "and for that reason I wish to absent myself; because I must either say this, and much more which it will be impossible for me to withhold if I am there; or else I must stay away." The conclusion was, that, as if he wished to get rid of the subject, he desired I would consider of it. This I could not refuse. So we parted. I imagine he was not much pleased with me; but I am pleased with myself, which I have not been for some time past. As for the rest, O gods, what an attendance! Or, as you used to say, what a ghastly troop! Among whom was the Eros^l of Celer. O ruinous state! O desperate forces! What think you of Servius' son? and Titinius's? How many have been in that very camp, by which Pompeius was besieged! Six legions! He is himself extremely vigilant and daring. I see no end of evil. Now at least you must deliver your opinion. What I have mentioned was the last thing that passed between us; yet his winding up, which I had almost omitted, was ungracious; that if he was not permitted to use my advice, he should use whose he could, and should think nothing beneath him. You see the man then, as you expressed it. "Were you grieved?" Undoubtedly. "Pray what followed?"

ⁱ The text is perhaps faulty. It may, however, be understood according to the above interpretation by pointing it thus—id modo nuntiant; Sane. In magnis, &c.

^j Rather esteem me for my attachment to Pompeius, than thank me for compliance with his own wishes.

^k Others were not under the same obligations to Pompeius.

^l Supposed to be some freed-man.

He went directly to Pedanum, I to Arpinum. Thence I look for your warbler". "Plague on it," you will say, "do not act over again what is past: even he whom we follow" has been much disappointed." But I expect your letter: for nothing is now as it was before, when you proposed that we should see first how this would turn out. The last subject of doubt related to our interview; in which I question not that I have given Cæsar some offence. This is a reason for determining the quicker. Pray let me have a letter from you, and a political one. I am very anxious to hear from you.

LETTER XIX.

I HAVE given my young Cicero the plain toga^a at Arpinum^b, in preference to any other place, as there was no going to Rome: and this was kindly received by my fellow-countrymen: though I saw the people there, and wherever I passed, afflicted and downcast; so sad and so dreadful is the contemplation of this great calamity. Levies are making, and troops taking up their winter-quarters. And if these measures, even when adopted by good citizens, in prosecution of a just war, and conducted with moderation, are yet in themselves grievous; how harsh do you suppose they now are, when they are adopted by desperate men, in a profligate civil war, and with all insolence! For you may be assured there is not an abandoned man in Italy who is not among them. I saw myself the whole body at Formiæ; and in truth never thought they deserved the name of men. I knew them all; but had never seen them together. Let me away, then, whither I may, and relinquish all I possess. Let me go to him, who will be more glad to see me than if I had originally been of his company. For then we had the greatest hope; now, I at least have none: yet, besides myself, nobody has left Italy, who did not believe Cæsar to be his enemy. And

I do this not for the sake of the republic, which I look upon as utterly extinguished; but that nobody may think me ungrateful towards him, who raised me out of the difficulties which he had brought upon me; and, at the same time, that I may not witness what is doing, or at least what will be done. Indeed, I imagine that some decrees of the senate have already been passed: I wish it may be in favour of Volcatius's opinion^c. Yet what does it signify? for all are of one mind. But Servius will be the most to blame, who sent his son to destroy Cn. Pompeius, or at least to take him prisoner^d, with Pontius Titinianus^e. This latter was actuated by fear^f; but the former—But let us cease to rail, and at length come to some conclusion; though I have nothing new but this, which I wish were the shortest possible, that there is life remaining^g. The Adriatic Sea being closely guarded, I shall sail by the Tyrrhenian; and if the passage from Puteoli be difficult, I shall make my way to Croton, or Thurii; and, good citizens as we are, and attached to our country, shall go to infest the sea^h. I see no other manner of conducting this war. We go to bury ourselves in Egyptⁱ. We cannot be a match for Cæsar with our army; and there is no reliance on peace. But all this has been abundantly deplored. I should be glad if you would deliver to Cephalion^j a letter about everything that is done, even about the conversation of people, unless they are quite dumbfounded. I have followed your advice, especially by maintaining in our interview the dignity I ought, and persisting in not going up to the city. It only remains to beg you will inform me as distinctly as possible (for there is no time to lose) what you approve, and what you think: though there is no longer any doubt. Yet if anything, or rather whatever occurs to your mind, pray let me know it.

^a To propose terms of peace.

^b The object of Cæsar's army at Brundisium could be nothing but either to destroy Pompeius, or to make him prisoner.

^c This must be the same as Titinius' son, mentioned before. See letter 18 of this book.

^d The fear of being ruined by Cæsar, if he had not joined him.

^e The text is obscure, and very probably corrupt, so that I offer this translation without any confidence.

^f That is, shall go to join Pompeius, even though his present purpose be to intercept the supplies of his country; for at that time Italy was furnished with corn by importation chiefly from Sicily and Egypt.

^g See letter 11 of this book.

^h The bearer, it is to be supposed, of Cicero's letter.

^a This is probably taken from some expression used by Atticus, and meant to denote the harbinger of spring, at which season Cicero would sail.

^b "Whom we follow," I imagine to be said by Cicero in his own person, thereby meaning Pompeius, though the sentence in which this stands is put into the mouth of Atticus.

^c The toga worn in mature age was without the purple border, which distinguished the prætecta of youth, and was therefore called the plain toga, or manly toga.

^d Arpinum was the place of Cicero's birth, where he continued to have a family seat.

BOOK X.

LETTER I.

ON the 3d of April, having come to my brother's house at Laterium⁷, I received your letter, and was a little revived; which had not been the case since this ruination. For I most highly value your approbation of my firmness⁸, and conduct. And when you tell me that Sextus also approves it, I am as much pleased as if I thought I had the commendation of his father, for whose judgment I always entertained the greatest respect: who formerly said to me, what I often recollect, on that 5th of December⁹, when I asked him, "Sextus, what then do you advise?" "Let me not die," said he in the words of Homer, "indolently and ignobly; but after some great deed, which may be heard by generations to come." His authority therefore lives with me; and his son, who is like him, has the same weight with me which the father had. I beg you to make my kindest compliments to him. Though you defer giving your opinion to no distant period; (for I imagine that hired peace-maker¹ has already summed up; already something has been done in that assembly of senators; for I do not esteem it a senate;) yet by that you keep me in suspense; the less so however, because I cannot doubt of your opinion about what I ought to do². Why else should you mention Flavius's having a legion and the province of Sicily, and that this is already carried into effect? What crimes, think you, are partly in preparation, and now contriving; partly on the point of being executed? And should I disregard that law of Solon, your fellow-citizen³, as I esteem it, and mine too, who made it a capital crime to join neither party in a civil commotion? Unless you are of a different opinion, both I and the children⁴ shall away from hence. But one of these is more certain than the other⁵: I shall not however be in a hurry; I shall wait for your advice, and for the letter which I desired you would send by Cephallion⁶, unless you have already sent another. When you say, not that you had heard it from any other quarter; but that you thought within yourself, I should be induced to go up, if the question of peace were agitated; it has never entered into my mind that any question of peace can be agitated, while it is most certainly his wish, if possible, to deprive Pompeius of his army and province: unless perhaps that summary speaker¹ can persuade him to be quiet, whilst the negotiators go backwards and forwards. I see nothing now that I can hope, or think possible to be done: yet this deserves the attention of an upright man, and is a great political question; whether one should enter into the counsels of a tyrant, when he is going to deliberate on some good cause. Therefore if it should happen that I am summoned (which I do not regard: for I told him what I should say upon the subject of peace¹, which he strongly reprobated), but yet if it should happen, let me know what you think I ought to do. Nothing has yet occurred which is more deserving of consideration. I am glad you were pleased with Trebatius's report; he is a good man, and a good citizen; and your own repeated expression of "excellent well," is the only thing that has hitherto given me satisfaction. I eagerly expect a letter from you, which I imagine has already been sent. You¹ and Sextus have maintained the same dignity which you recommend to me. Your friend Celer is more eloquent than wise. What you heard from Tullia about the young men is true. What you mention about M. Antonius², appears to me not so bad in fact as in sound. This irresolution, in which I now am, is as bad as death: for I ought either to have acted with freedom among the ill-disposed; or, even at some hazard, to have joined the good party. "Let us either follow the rash measures of the good; or let us lash the boldness of the wicked!" Both are attended with danger: but the course I take is not dishonourable, and yet is not safe. I do not think that he³ who sent his son to Brundisium on the subject of peace (about which I entertain the same sentiments as you, that it is a palpable pretence, and that war is preparing with all vigour) is likely to be appointed. Of this, as I hoped, no mention has hitherto been made⁴. I have therefore the less occasion to write, or even to think what I should do, in case I were appointed.

² See book ix. letter 18.

⁴ It is doubtful to what this alludes; and indeed it is doubtful if the text be correct.

⁶ Perhaps Balbus; the younger Balbus, who was his nephew by birth, being his son by adoption. See book viii. letter 9.

⁷ I understand this to mean that no mention had been made of appointing anybody to negotiate with Pompeius: and he was glad of it, not because he did not wish for peace, but because he saw that all overtures for that purpose would be ineffectual on the part of Caesar, and only designed either to allay the clamours of some well-meaning persons in Italy, or to embarrass and cast an odium upon Pompeius.

⁸ In resisting Caesar's wishes about going to Rome. See book ix. letter 18.

⁹ Distinguished by the vigorous measures adopted in the Catilinarian conspiracy by Cicero, who was then consul.

³ An Athenian: to which title not only Atticus but Cicero might reasonably aspire, from his attachment to Athens.

⁴ His son and nephew.

⁵ His own departure was more certain than that of the boys.

LETTER II.

I RECEIVED your letter the 5th of April, which was brought by Cephalion; and had designed to remain the following day at Minturnæ, and thence immediately to embark; but I stopped at my brother's house in Arcanum, that, till the arrival of some surer information^a, I might be less observed, and yet everything might be done^b which could be done without me. The warbler is now here^c, and I am eager to be off; no matter whither, or by what passage. But this will be for my consideration with those who understand it^d. Continue, as far as you can, to assist me with your counsels, as you have hitherto done. The state of affairs is incapable of being disentangled: everything must be left to fortune. I struggle without any hope. If anything better should occur, it will be a surprise. I hope Dionysius has not set out to come hither, as my daughter Tullia wrote me word. Not only the time is unsuitable; but I do not care to have my troubles, great as they are, made an exhibition to one who is not friendly. I do not however wish you to quarrel with him on my account.

LETTER III.

THOUGH I have really nothing to tell you, yet this is what I wanted besides to know^a: whether Cæsar was set out^b; in what state he left the city, and whom he had appointed over different districts and offices; whether any commissioners had been sent by decree of the senate to treat with Pompeius and the consuls on the subject of peace. Wishing therefore to know this, I have for that purpose sent this letter; and I shall be obliged to you to inform me about this, and anything which it may concern me to know. I shall wait in Arcanum till I hear. This is the second letter I have dictated to you this same 7th of April, having written a longer the day before with my own hand^c. They say that you were seen in the court^d; not that I mean to accuse you; for I am myself open to the same accusation^e. I am expecting to hear from you, yet do not know very well what I should expect. However, if there is nothing, I shall be glad to hear even that. Cæsar by letter excuses me for not going up, and says that he takes it in good part. I do not regard what he adds, that Tullus and Servius have complained of his not granting the same liberty to them as to me. The silly men! who would send their sons to besiege Cn. Pompeius, yet hesitate themselves to go into the senate. But I send you a copy of Cæsar's letter^f.

LETTER IV.

I HAVE received several letters from you the same day, all full of information; one particularly, which is equivalent to a volume, deserves to be repeatedly read, as I do^a. I assure you that your pains have not been thrown away, and that I am extremely obliged to you. And as long as you can, that is, as long as you know where to find me, I earnestly beg that you will continue to write very frequently. But let us at length make an end, if possible, or some moderation, which is certainly possible, of the wailing which I daily utter. For I now no longer think of the dignity, the honours, the state of life, which I have lost; but what I have enjoyed, what I have done, in what reputation I have lived; and, even in these calamities, what difference exists between me, and those on whose account I have lost everything. These are they who, unless they had driven me from the country, thought they could not obtain the indulgence of their wishes; of whose association and wicked combination you see the issue. The one^b burns with fury and wickedness, and, instead of relaxing, is daily growing more violent; first he drove him^c from Italy; now he endeavours to persecute him in another^d quarter, to plunder him in another^e province: nor does he any longer refuse, but in some measure demands, that, as he is, so also he may be called, a tyrant. The other; he, who formerly would not so much as raise me up when I was prostrate at his feet; who said he could do nothing contrary to Cæsar's will; having escaped from the hands and sword of his father-in-law^f, is preparing war by sea and land, not indeed without provocation; but however just, or even necessary, yet ruinous to his fellow-citizens, unless he conquers; calamitous even if he does conquer. Great as these generals are, I do not set their actions, nor their fortune, before my own, however flourishing they may seem, however afflicted I. For who can ever be happy, that has either abandoned his country, or enlaved it? And if, as you remind me, I have rightly said in my book^g, that nothing is good but what is honourable, nothing evil but what is base; then assuredly each of those men is most wretched; both of whom have always preferred their own power and their private advantage before their country's prosperity and honour. I am therefore supported by an excellent conscience, when I reflect that I have either rendered the greatest services to my country when it was in my power; or certainly have never thought of it but with reverence; and that the republic has been overthrown by that very storm which I foresaw fourteen years ago^h. I shall go then with this conscience accompanying me, in great affliction it is true; yet that, not so much on my own or on my brother's account, (for our age, whether well or otherwise, is already spent) as on account of the boys, to whom I sometimes think it was due to have transmitted also our free constitution. One of these^s, being better disposed, does not so prodigiously torment me: but the other—O sad affair! In my whole life nothing ever happened more vexatious^t. Spoiled by my indulgence, he has gone such lengths as I dare not mention: but I am expecting to hear from you; for you said you would write fully when you had seen him. All my kindness towards him has been tempered with much severity; nor is it a single or small fault that I have suppressed, but many and great ones. And his father's lenity should rather have called forth his affection, than been so cruelly slighted. The letter he wrote to Cæsar gave me so much pain, that I never mentioned it to you; but we see how it has soured his own behaviour. But of this journey, and affectation of duty, I cannot venture to speak as it deserves. I only know that, after the interview with Hortius, he was sent for by Cæsar, and talked with him about my mind being entirely alienated from his measures, and my design of leaving Italy: and even this I mention with timidity. No blame however attaches to me: the fear is for his natural disposition. It was this that corrupted Curio, and Hortensius' son; not any fault of their parents. My brother is dejected with sorrow, and afraid not so much for his own life as for mine. To this, to this evil, bring consolation, if you can find any. I should wish particularly that his wife may either receive the reports that have been brought to me as false, or suppose them to be less than they are. If they are true, I know not what may be likely to ensue in this condition and flight. If we had yet a free government, I should not be at a loss respecting either the severity or the indulgence to be used. Either anger, or grief, or fear, has prompted me to write this with more asperity than accords with either your or my affection towards him. If what I have heard be true, you will pardon me; if false, I shall be very glad to have you pluck from me this error. But however this be, you will impute nothing to the uncle, or to the father. When I had written so far, I received a message from Curio, that he would call upon me; for he had arrived in Cumanum the evening before, that is, the 13th. Therefore, if I collect from his conversation anything to tell you, I will add it to my letter.

Curio passed by my house, and sent me word that he would come presently. He went to address the people at Puteoli; and having done so, he returned, and was with me a considerable time. O foul affair! You know the man; he concealed nothing. In the first place, nothing is more certain than that all who had been condemned by the Pompeian law will be restored^j; accordingly he is to make use of their services in Sicily. He made no doubt of Cæsar's getting possession of Spain; that he would then pursue Pompeius with his army, wherever he might be; and that his death would be the termination of the war. Nothing could be nearer accomplished^k: that Cæsar had wished in the transport of his anger to have had the tribune Metellus^l put to death; and if this had been executed, a great slaughter must have ensued: that many had advised a slaughter; and that he abstained from cruelty, not by inclination, or natural disposition, but because he thought that clemency was popular; but that if he lost the affections of the people, he would become cruel; and he was much disturbed when he understood that he had given offence to the populace in the affair of the treasury^m. In consequence of which, though he had determined to harangue the people before he left the city, he did not venture to do so, and set out with his mind greatly agitated. Upon my asking him what he foresaw; what conduct; what republic; he plainly acknowledged that there was no hope remaining. Heⁿ was afraid of Pompeius' fleet; and said that if it should be collected, he should quit Sicily. What, said I, are those six fasces of yours? If they are granted by the senate, why are they covered with laurel? By Cæsar, why are there six? "I wished," says he, "to get them by a surreptitious decree of the senate, for it could not be done otherwise; but now he is become much more hostile to the senate, and says, 'From me everything shall proceed.' They are six, because I did not choose to have twelve, as I might." I then said, how much I wished that I had asked Cæsar for what I understood Philippus has obtained^o; but I was ashamed, because he had not obtained anything^p from me. "He would willingly have granted it to you," says he: "but suppose yourself to have obtained it; for I will inform him, as you yourself shall please, of our having talked together about it: but what does it signify to him where you are, since you refuse to come into the senate? Yet now you would have given him no offence on that account, if you had not been in Italy." To which I replied, that I sought for retirement and solitude, especially on account of my lictors. He applauded my conduct. Well, then, said I, my way to Greece lies through your province^q, since the coast of the Adriatic is occupied by soldiers. "What," said he, "could be more desirable for me?" And he added a great deal with much liberality. So that this is now settled, that I can sail not only safely, but openly. The rest he postponed to the next day, in which if there should be anything worth relating, I will let you know it. There are some things, however, which I omitted to ask; as, whether Cæsar would wait for an interregnum^r or—how can I pronounce it? He said that the consulate had been offered to himself, but that he had declined it for the next year. There are other circumstances, also, about which I shall inquire. In conclusion, he swears, what he would easily accomplish, that Caesar ought to be most friendly towards me. "For what, I say," has Dolabella written to me?" I asked what? He^a asserted, that when he had written to desire that I would go to Rome, Caesar expressed the greatest thankfulness, and not only approved, but was even glad that I had acted as I did. What think you? I have resumed my composure. For that suspicion of domestic calamity, and of the conversation with Hirtius, has been greatly relieved. How I wish him^b to prove worthy of us! And how I invite myself to find some excuse^c for him! But it is necessary to have some communication with Hirtius. There must be something; but I should be glad if it might turn out to be inconsiderable. And yet I wonder he should not have come back. But we shall see how it is. You will let the Oppii give credit to Terentia^d. This is now the only thing to be apprehended in the city^e. Assist me, however, with your advice, whether I should go by land to Rhegium, or should embark from hence. But since I do not go immediately, I shall have something to write to you, as soon as I have seen Curio. Pray take care, as usual, to let me know how Tiro goes on^f.

LETTER V.

Or my general intention I conceive I have already written to you explicitly enough; respecting the day, nothing can be said with certainty, but that it will not be before the new moon. Curio's discourse the next day came to the same amount, unless that he still more openly gave me to understand that he saw no end to this state of things. The charge you impose upon me of regulating the young Quintus, is an Arcadian undertaking^g. However, I will leave nothing untried; and I wish you would do so too: but I shall not spare him. I wrote immediately to Vestorius about Tullia^h; and indeed she pressed me earnestly. Vectenus has spoken to you more reasonably than he wrote to me; but I cannot sufficiently express my surprise at the carelessness of the inscriptionⁱ. For upon hearing from Philotimus that I might purchase that cottage from Canuleius for 50 sester tia (400*l.*), and might have it for less, if I applied to Vectenus; I did apply to him to get some abatement, if he could, from that sum. He engaged to do so; and sent me word a little while ago, that he had bought it for 30 sester tia (240*l.*), and desired I would let him know to whom I would have it assigned; that the money was to be paid the 13th of November. I wrote to him rather angrily, yet with a familiar joke. But now, as he acts with liberality, I do not mean to find fault with him, and have written to tell him that I had been set right by you. I shall be glad to hear what you intend about your journey, and when. April 17.

LETTER VI.

NOTHING now stops me but the season. I shall use no cunning in my proceedings^a, happen what may in Spain. Nevertheless keep my counsel. I have explained to you all my intentions in a former letter, for which reason this will be short; besides, I am in a hurry, and busy. Respecting young Quintus, "I take all pains"^b—you know the rest. The advice you give me is both friendly and prudent; but everything will be easy, if I can only guard against him^c. It is an arduous task. There are many excellent^d points about him: but nothing plain, nothing candid. I wish you had undertaken to manage the young man; for his father, by his over-indulgence, undoes whatever I do. If I could act without the father's interference, I could manage him. This you can do^e. But I forgive him. It is, I say, an arduous task. I have been confidently told that Pompeius is going through Illyrium to Gaul^f. I must now consider how and which way I shall proceed.

LETTER VII.

I QUITE approve your going to Apulia and Sipontum, and that appearance^a of unsettledness, and do not consider you to be under the same circumstances as myself. Not but we have both the same duty to perform in the republic; but that is not the question. The struggle is, who shall be king; in which the more moderate king has been driven out, he who is the better and honestest of the two, who must conquer, or the very name of the Roman people will be extinguished: yet if he conquers, he will conquer after the manner and example of Sulla. In this struggle, therefore, it is Cicero by the title of "Proconsul." [see letter 11 of this book.] in consequence of which Cicero in return called him monetalis, or "money-stamper." Cicero seems to have been displeased with the abrupt manner in which Vectenus had concluded the purchase, and fixed the day of payment, without consulting him.

^a Shall not wait to see how things turn out in Spain.

^b This alludes to a passage in Terence, where an old man exposes the pains he has taken to educate his son.

^c Young Quintus.

^d See letters 10 and 12 of this book.

^e Cicero was living with his brother Quintus, whereas Atticus was beyond the reach of his influence.

^f I suppose on his way to Spain; but it was not true.

^g Atticus, not willing to offend Caesar by abruptly quitting Italy, seems to have intended to pass some time irregularly in the south-eastern parts previously to his departure.

^a I understand these to be the words of Curio, so that inquam means Curio said.

^b Dolabella.

^c Young Quintus.

^d This I conceive to be the meaning of the original, which has been variously interpreted, and, as is too frequent in obscure texts, unwarrantably altered.

^e See note ^a on book viii. letter 7.

^f The want of money is the only thing to be apprehended for Terentia; the number of other females of distinction doing away any impropriety in her remaining there. See book vii. letter 14.

^g It will be remembered that Tiro was left ill at Patrae.

^h In the original is the word Arcadia, which is probably taken from an oracle reported in the first book of Herodotus's history, discountenancing, as a work of great difficulty, a meditated attack of Arcadia by the Laedemonians. See letter 12 of this book.

ⁱ It is uncertain to what this alludes; but seems, by what follows, [see letter 13 of this book.] most probably to relate to an advance of money.

^k This may probably allude to Vectenus having called not for you openly to espouse either party, but to bend to the times. But my case is a different one, being under such obligations that I cannot bear to appear ungrateful. I do not, however, think of going into the field; but of retiring into Malta, or some other place of equal insignificance. You will say, "By this you do not help him, towards whom you wish to show your gratitude: nay, perhaps he would rather have wished you did not go." But about this we shall see afterwards. Let me but get out; which Dolabella and Curio enable me to do at a better season, the one by the Adriatic sea, the other by the straits of Sicily¹. I have had some hopes that Servius Sulpicius might wish to converse with me²; and I sent my freed-man Philotimus to him with a letter. If he will act a manly part, it may prove a valuable meeting; if otherwise, I shall still maintain the same character as I used to do. Curio has been staying with me, thinking that Cæsar is dejected by the popular displeasure, and himself diffident about Sicily, if Pompeius should have set sail. I have given the young Quintus a rough reception. I find it was avarice, and the hope of a handsome present. This is bad enough, but I trust there is nothing of that baseness which I had apprehended³. This fault I imagine you will attribute not to my indulgence, but to his natural disposition, while I endeavour by discipline to regulate him. You will arrange with Philotimus what you think best about the Oppii of Velia⁴. I shall consider Epirus as my own⁵; but I think of taking a different course.

LETTER VIII.

THE state of things admonishes, and you have pointed out, and I see myself, that it is time to put an end to our writing upon such subjects as it might be hazardous to have intercepted. But as my daughter Tullia frequently writes to me, begging me to wait the event of what is doing in Spain, and constantly adds that you are of the same opinion, which indeed I perceive by your letters; I have thought it not unsuitable to let you know my sentiments upon that subject. I think the advice would be prudent, if I meant to shape my conduct by the fate of Spain, which you say I ought to do. For it must necessarily happen, either that Cæsar is driven out of Spain, which I should exceedingly desire; or that the war is protracted; or that he, as he seems confidently to expect, seizes upon Spain. If he is driven out, with what grace or honour shall I then go to Pompeius, when I imagine Curio himself⁶ will go over to him? If the war is protracted, for what am I to wait, or how long? It remains, that if we are beaten in Spain, I should be quiet. But upon this point I think otherwise. For I would sooner desert him⁷ a conqueror, than conquered and doubtful (instead of confident) of his affairs. Inasmuch as I foresee executions if he is victorious, and violation of private property, and the recall of exiles, and cancelling of debts, and honours bestowed upon the basest men, and a kingdom such as not only no Roman, but not even any Persian can bear, is it possible for my indignation to be silent? Can my eyes sustain the sight of my delivering my opinion⁸ in the company of Gabinius? And even of his being called upon to speak first? In the presence of your client Clælius? In that of C. Ateius's client Plaguleius? And the rest? But why do I enumerate my enemies? while I cannot without pain see in the senate my own connexions⁹, whom I have myself defended, nor act amongst them without shame. What if it is by no means certain that I should be allowed to do so? For their friends write me word that he is far from being satisfied with me, because I have not gone into the senate. However, I cannot entertain a thought of recommending myself to him, and that with some risk, with whom I refused to be united even with recompense. Then consider this, that the whole contest is not to be decided in Spain; unless you suppose that, upon losing this, Pompeius will throw up his arms; notwithstanding his whole plan is Themistoclean¹⁰. For he deems him who is in possession of the sea to be necessarily master of affairs. Hence, without ever striving to keep Spain by itself, he has always made naval preparations his principal care. He will accordingly sail, when the season is fit, with a prodigious fleet, and will come to Italy; where what shall I be, sitting idle? For it will no longer be allowable to be neuter. Shall I then oppose his fleet? What evil can be greater, or even so great? What indeed can be baser? Have I feebly¹¹ and alone borne his wickedness against the absent; and shall I not bear it in company with Pompeius and the other chiefs? But if, setting aside duty, we consider only the danger: there is danger from those¹², if I do wrong; from him¹³, if I do right: nor can any plan be devised in these troubles which is free from danger. There can therefore be no doubt but I should avoid doing anything base with danger, which I would avoid even with safety. Should I not have crossed the sea along with Pompeius? It was not in my power; there is the account of the days. Besides (to confess the truth, without that concealment which I might use), one thing deceived me, which perhaps ought not, but I did deceive me; for I thought there would be peace: and if this had taken place, I did not care to have Cæsar angry with me, at the time that he would be reconciled to Pompeius. For I had already felt the effects¹⁴ of their union. It was through fear of this that I fell into this dilatoriness. But I shall obtain every purpose if I make¹⁵ haste: if I delay, I shall lose it. And yet, my Atticus, certain auguries inspire me with confident hope; not the auguries of our college¹⁶ collected by Appius, but those of Plato on the subject of tyrants. For I do not see by what means he can long remain without falling off himself, even without any exertion on our part: since fresh and flourishing, in the space of six or seven days, he became the object of the bitterest hatred to that same indigent and abandoned multitude; having so soon lost the pretension of two things; of clemency, in the case of Metellus^b; of wealth, in the affair of the treasury^c. Now what companions or ministers can he employ, if the provinces, if the republic is to be governed by persons, no one of whom has been able to regulate his own patrimony for two months? There is no enumerating all the particulars, which you will readily comprehend; only place them in your view, and you will presently understand that such a kingdom can hardly last six months. If I am mistaken in this, I shall bear it, as many excellent men, distinguished in the republic, have borne it: unless you imagine that I would rather die like Sardanapalus in his bed^d, than in a Themistoclean exile: who being, as Thucydides says, "the ablest to apprehend things present, after the shortest consultation; and far the best to conjecture of things to come, what was likely to take place;" yet fell into those straits, which he would have avoided, if nothing had deceived him. Though he was one who, in the words of the same author, "eminently foresaw advantages and disadvantages, while they were yet in obscurity;" yet he did not see either how to escape the envy of the Lacedæmonians, or that of his own fellow-citizens, nor what he was promising to Artaxerxes. That night would not have been so calamitous to the prudent Africanus; nor that day of Sulla's superiority so sad to the shrewd C. Marius; if nothing had deceived them. Nevertheless I support my opinion by the augury I have mentioned. This does not deceive me; nor will it turn out otherwise. He must fall either by his enemies, or by himself, who indeed is his own worst enemy. I hope this may happen during my life, though it is time for me to think of that eternal, not of this short life. But should anything happen to me sooner than I expect, it signifies little whether I see it done, or foresee that it will be done. This being so, it is not to be borne, that I should submit to those against whom the senate armed me with authority to see that the republic received no detriment^e. To you I commend all my concerns; though such is your affection towards me that they need not my commendation. In fact I have nothing to tell you; for I sit here only waiting for an opportunity to sail. Yet nothing ever so demanded to be told, as that of all your multiplied kindnesses none was at any time more acceptable to me than the sweet and assiduous attention you have bestowed on my dear Tullia. She is herself highly gratified by it; and I no less so. Her excellence is indeed wonderful. How does she bear the public misfortunes! How her own domestic embarrassments! And what a courage does she show at my departure! Call it natural affection, or the completest union of minds; yet she would have me do what is right, and be well esteemed. But of this too much, lest I call forth my own sensibility. If you hear anything certain about Spain, or anything else, while I remain in Italy, you will write to me. And at my departure, I shall perhaps send again to you; and the rather, because Tullia seemed to think you would not at present leave Italy. I must manage to get Antonius's consent, as well as Curio's, to my residing at Malta, without taking a part in this war. I wish I may find him as accommodating and kind to me as Curio. He^f is said to be coming to Misenum the 2d of May, that is to-day; but he has sent before an ungracious letter, of which I inclose a copy.

Antonius, Tribune of the People, Proprator, to Cicero, Imperator.

UNLESS I had a great regard for you, indeed much greater than you imagine, I should not have minded the report which is spread about you, especially as I do not believe it; yet loving you as I do, I cannot dissemble that the very rumour, however unfounded, greatly affects me. I cannot think that you will cross the sea, considering your affection for Dolabella and your daughter, that accomplished woman, and the esteem in which you are held by all of us^g, to whom indeed your dignity and splendour are almost dearer than to yourself. But I have not thought it the part of a friend to be indifferent to what is said even by ill-disposed persons; and I have acted with the greater zeal, because I consider the task imposed upon me to be the more difficult, owing to the offence which has arisen between us^h, rather from my jealousy than from any injury on your part. For I would have you believe that, excepting my Cæsar, nobody is dearer to me than you, and that at the same time I am persuaded Cæsar esteems M. Cicero among his best friends. Therefore I beg you, my Cicero, to take no hasty step,—but to distrust the attachment of oneⁱ, who first injured you that he might afterwards confer a kindness; and on the other hand not to run away from one^j who, though he should not love you (which, however, cannot be the case), yet would wish you to be in safety and in honour. I have expressly sent to you my intimate friend Calpurnius, that you may be assured of the great interest I take in your life and dignity.

The same day Philotimus brought the following letter from Cæsar.

Cæsar, Imperator, to Cicero, Imperator.

THOUGH I was persuaded that you would do nothing rashly or imprudently, yet I have been moved by common report to write to you, and to request, by the intimacy between us, that you would not in this declining state of affairs take any step which you did not think it necessary to take in their sound state. For you will both inflict a severer blow on our friendship, and less well consult your own advantage, if you appear to be influenced not by the course of events (for everything seems to have fallen out most favourable to us, most adverse to them), nor by attachment to the cause (for that was the same when you judged it proper to abstain from their counsels), but by condemnation of some act of mine,—than which you can do nothing more painful to me. That you may not do it I beg of you, by the right of our friendship. Besides, what can be more proper for a good and peaceable man and a good citizen than to abstain from civil broils? This some who would wish it cannot do because of the danger; you, to whom the testimony of my life and the assurance of my friendship are well known, will never find anything either more secure or more honourable than to abstain from all hostility. April 16. On my journey.

LETTER IX.

THE arrival of Philotimus (what a fellow he is! how silly! how often misrepresenting in favour of Pompeius!) has frightened to death all my companions. As for myself, I am become callous. None of our people entertained a doubt of "Cæsar's having checked his progress;" whereas he is said to advance with the utmost speed: and that "Petreius had joined Afranius," though he brings no intelligence of the kind. In short it was even believed that Pompeius was passing with a great force through Illyrium into Germany; for this was confidently asserted. I am of opinion, therefore, that I ought to get away to Malta, till we see what is done in Spain. From Cæsar's letter it appears as if I might almost do this with his consent; for he says that I can do nothing more honourable or more safe than to withdraw from all contention. You will say then, "where is that resolution which you professed in your last letter." It is here, and it is unaltered. But I wish it were possible to determine only at my own risk. The tears of my family sometimes soften me, when they entreat me to await the issue of the war in Spain. The boys could not without great emotion read a letter from M. Cælius written in a lamentable strain, and entreating me to wait for the same event, and not to betray so rashly my fortunes, my only daughter, and all my connexions. My own son, indeed, is of greater spirit, and for that very reason affects me the more, and seems to be anxious only about my reputation. To Malta, therefore: thence whither it shall seem prudent. Do you, however, even now let me hear from you, especially if there is any news of Afranius. If I have any conversation with Antonius, I will let you know what has been done: but, as you advise, I shall be cautious in trusting him; for^k the means of concealing my design are both difficult and dangerous. I expect Servius on the seventh of May, for whom I shall wait, at the desire of Postumia^l and the young Servius. I rejoice to hear that your age is better. I send you a copy of Cælius's letter.

^k This relates to the expediency of obtaining Antonius's consent to Cicero's departure, since it was both difficult and dangerous to attempt it by stealth.

Cælius to Cicero.

I AM distressed by your letter, in which you show that your thoughts are engaged about nothing but what is sad. What this is you do not expressly say; nevertheless you sufficiently declare the nature of what you contemplate. I therefore write this letter to you without loss of time, to beg and beseech you, Cicero, by your fortunes, by your children, not to adopt any measure prejudicial to your happiness and security. For I call the gods, and men, and our friendship, to witness that I have told you beforehand, and have given you this counsel not hastily, but have informed you after being with Cæsar, and knowing what his disposition would be should he gain the victory,—if you imagine that Cæsar will continue to observe the same moderation in liberating his adversaries and submitting to their conditions, you are mistaken. His thoughts, and indeed his declarations, breathe nothing but what is severe and cruel. He went away much out of humour with the senate, and thoroughly provoked by the opposition to his wishes^m. There will assuredly be no room for mercy. Therefore, if you have any regard for yourself, for your only son, for your family, for your remaining hopes,—if I, if that excellent man your son-in-law, have any weight with you, you ought not wilfully to disturb their fortune,—so that we should be obliged to hate, or relinquish, that cause in the success of which our happiness consists, or else entertain the impious wish of injuring you. Lastly, think what offence you must already have givenⁿ by your delay. But now, to oppose Cæsar in the time of victory, whom you were unwilling to offend while his cause was doubtful, and to join those in their fight whom you refused to follow as long as they resisted, is the height of folly. Take care that while you are ashamed to be wanting in the duties of the best citizen, you are not too negligent in choosing what is the best course. But if I cannot entirely prevail with you, at least wait till it is known how we go on in Spain; which, I announce to you, will be ours upon the arrival of Cæsar. What hope they may have after Spain is lost I know not: and what can be your object in uniting with a desperate cause, I cannot for my life discover. This, which without saying it you gave me to understand, Cæsar had heard; and as soon as he had asked me how I did, he mentioned what he had heard about you. I professed my ignorance; but begged him to write to you in such a manner as might be most likely to induce you to stay. He takes me with him to Spain. If this were not so before I went to the city, wherever you were, I would have run down to you and argued the point with you in person, and used my utmost endeavour to keep you. Consider, Cicero, again and again, that you may not utterly ruin yourself and all your family, nor plunge yourself, with your eyes open, into a situation from whence you see no retreat. But if the language of the best citizens affects you, or if you cannot bear the insolence and haughtiness of certain persons, you may choose, I think, some town free from war while these matters are deciding, which will presently be concluded. If you do this I shall think you have acted wisely, and you will give no offence to Cæsar.

LETTER X.

BLIND that I am, not to have foreseen this! I sent you Antonius's letter. Having repeatedly written to him that I entertained no designs against Cæsar's measures,—that I was mindful of my son-in-law, mindful of our friendship,—that if I thought otherwise I might have been with Pompeius, but that I wished to be out of the way, because I did not like to be running about with my lictors,—that this measure, however, was not even now determined. To these observations see how superciliously he replies:—

"How true are your professions! For one who wishes to be neuter remains in his country; he who goes away appears to pass judgment upon one of the parties. But I am not the person to determine whether anybody is at liberty to go away or not. Cæsar has laid this duty upon me, that I should suffer nobody at all to leave Italy. My approving your intention is, therefore, of little consequence, as I have no authority to remit anything. I think you should apply to Cæsar, and ask leave from him. I do not doubt but you will obtain it, especially as you promise to observe the relations of our friendship."

Here is a Spartan despatch^a for you! I shall by all means deceive the man. He was to come on the evening of the third, that is to-day; therefore to-morrow he may perhaps call upon me. I shall endeavour to appear in no hurry^b. I shall give out that I mean to apply to Cæsar: I shall conceal myself somewhere with very few attendants, and shall certainly fly away from hence in spite of these people. I wish it may be to Curio^c; this I say to you, God willing. I have received a great additional uneasiness. Something worthy of me^d shall be accomplished. I am exceedingly sorry for your dysury. Attend to it, I beseech you, while it is yet recent. I was pleased with your account of the people at Marseilles^e! I beg to be informed of everything you may hear. I should like Sicily, if I might go openly; which I had obtained from Curio. I wait here for Servius, as I am requested by his wife and son, and as I think it expedient. This fellow takes Cytheris^f with him in an open carriage; a second conveys his wife; and there are besides seven others together, of his girls think you or boys? See by how vile a death we perish; and doubt, if you can, of the havoc he^g will make, whether he come back conquered or conqueror.

^a The original is expressed in two Greek words, signifying a particular kind of cipher used by the government of Sparta, to which their generals were expected to pay implicit obedience.

^b The text is evidently corrupt; but I read it with the least alteration—Tentabo autem nihil properare.

^c "I should be glad to get to Sicily under the command of Curio;" who, though of Cæsar's party, was personally attached to Clæro. From thence Clæro would proceed to Malta.

^d This is said perhaps from a feeling of some dissatisfaction at the part he had hitherto acted.

^e They shut their gates against Cæsar.

^f Cytheris was Antonius's mistress.

^g Cæsar.

But I, if there should be no ship, will go even in a cock-boat, to snatch myself from the violence of these people. I will write more after I have seen him. I cannot help loving our young nephew, though I plainly see that I am not loved by him. I never saw anything so intractable, so set against his family, so absorbed in his own conceit. What an incredible weight of troubles! I will, however, and do, take pains to correct him; for he has excellent abilities^h, but requires great attention to his temper.

LETTER XI.

AFTER sealing my last letter, I did not choose to deliver it to the person I had intended, because he was not one of my own servants. For this reason it was not delivered that day. In the mean time Philotimus arrived, and brought me yours; in which what you say about my brother certainly shows a want of steadiness; but has nothing insincere, nothing fraudulent, nothing that may not be turned to good, nothing that you may not by a single word lead whither you will. In short, he is affectionate towards all his friends, even those with whom he often quarrels; and me he loves better than himself. I do not blame him for sending a differentⁱ account to you about your nephew, and to the mother about her son. What you mention about the journey, and about your sister, is vexatious, and the more so, because my time is so contracted that it is not in my power to remedy it; for remedy it I certainly would. But you see in what troubles and difficulties I am. The money concerns are not such (for I often hear from him) that he does not wish to pay you, and is earnest to do so. But if Q. Axius, in this my flight, does not repay me thirteen sestertia (100*l.*) which I lent to his son, but excuses himself on account of the times; if Lepta, if others do the same; I cannot forbear wondering, when I hear from him that he is pressed for some 20 sestertia (160*l.*). For you see the difficulties. He has ordered, however, that the money may be provided for you. Do you think him slow, or backward, in such affairs? Nobody is less so. But enough about my brother. Respecting his son, it is true that his father always indulged him: but indulgence does not make one deceitful, or covetous, or without natural affection; though it may perhaps create haughtiness, and arrogance, and moroseness. Accordingly he has these faults also, which arise from indulgence; but they are supportable; for why should I add, at his time of life? But the former, which to me who love him are more grievous than these very calamities in which I am placed, are not the effects of our tenderness; no, they have roots of their own; which, however, I would pluck out if it were possible. But the times are such that I must put up with everything. My own son I easily restrain; for nothing is more tractable; and it is in compassion to him that I have hitherto adopted less vigorous counsels; and the more he wishes me to exert myself, the more I am afraid of injuring him. Antonius arrived yesterday evening. He may perhaps soon call upon me; or he may not even do that; as he wrote to explain his wishes. But you shall know immediately what is done. I must now conduct everything secretly. What shall I do about the boys? Shall I trust them to a small row-boat? What inclination do you imagine I shall have for sailing? For I remember, even in summer time, how uneasy I was sailing with that open vessel of the Rhodians⁷: what do you suppose then will be the case in this severe season with a little barge? It is every way a sad state. Trebatius is with me, a thoroughly honest man, and good citizen. What monstrous things does he relate! Immortal gods! Does Balbus also think of coming into the senate? But I shall to-morrow get him to carry a letter to you himself. I am ready to believe Vectenus is kindly disposed towards me, as you say. I had joked with him a little angrily for having written to me so peremptorily about providing the money⁸. If he received this otherwise than he ought, you will soften it. I addressed him coiner, because he had addressed me proconsul. But since he is an honest man, and friendly towards me, I am ready also to be friendly towards him.

LETTER XII.

WHAT will become of me? Or who is there not only more unfortunate, but more disgraced, than I am? Antonius says that he has received orders^a about me by name. He has not however yet seen me, but mentioned this to Trebatius. What can I do now? Nothing prospers with me; and what has been considered with the greatest care, turns out the most unhappily. For when I had gained Curio, I thought I had obtained everything. He had written to Hortensius^b about me; and Reginus was entirely with me. I never suspected that Antonius would have anything to do with this sea^c. Which way shall I now turn myself? I am beset on all sides. But enough of lamentation. I must sail then unseasonably, and creep unobserved into some merchant-ship. I must not let it seem as if I were stopped with my own concurrence^d. I must endeavour to get to Sicily; which if I accomplish, I shall pursue something further. Let but things go on well in Spain. Though about Sicily itself, I wish the news may be true; but hitherto nothing has happened favourably. It is reported that a concourse of Sicilians assembled round Cato, entreating him to resist, and promising everything; and that he was moved by it, and began to levy troops. I do not believe it, however illustrious be its author. That the province might be kept, I know. But we shall soon have news from Spain. We have here C. Marcellus intent upon the same purpose^e, or excellently feigning it: though I have not seen him myself, but hear it from one who is intimate with him. Pray let me hear if you have anything new. If I make any attempt, I will immediately write to you. I shall deal severely with young Quintus: I wish I may be able to do any good. But do you tear the letters in which I have said anything harshly of him, for fear of some disclosure: I will do the same with yours. I am waiting for Servius, yet do not expect from him any sound advice. You shall know whatever is the result. It must doubtless be confessed that I have committed errors. But is it once only? and on one occasion? Nay, everything, the more it has been considered, the more imprudently has it been done. But, as Homer says, "what is past, we must let be, however sorry:" in what remains, let us only not rush on our ruin. You bid me be circumspect in my departure. In what respect should I be circumspect? All the accidents that can occur are so manifest, that if I would avoid them, I must sit down in shame and grief; if I should neglect them, I am in danger of falling into the hands of abandoned men. But see in what great difficulties I am. I sometimes think it would be desirable to sustain even some severe injury from these people, that it may appear how hateful I am to the tyrant. If the course I had hoped were open to me, I would have accomplished something, as you wish and exhort, that should justify my delay. But the guard that is kept is surprising; and I have some suspicions even of Curio himself. I must act therefore either by force or by stealth: and if by force, I shall perhaps have to contend also with the season. But by stealth, is by stealth from these people; in which if there should be any failure, you see what disgrace impends. But I am drawn on, and must not recede through fear of some outrage. I often think with myself about Cælius^f; and, should I have any similar opportunity, I shall not let it slip. I hope that Spain is steady. The affair of Marseilles, as it is noble in itself, so is it an argument with me that all is right in Spain; for they would not show such resolution if it were otherwise; and they would know the truth, being so near and vigilant. You rightly take notice of the disapprobation expressed in the theatre. I perceive also, that the legions which he took up in Italy are very much dissatisfied. But yet nothing is more hostile, than he is to himself. You justly fear his breaking out into violence. If he is driven to despair, he will certainly do so. This increases the propriety of effecting something in the same spirit as Cælius, but I should hope with better success. But everything in its turn: whatever is done first, you shall immediately know it. I will, as you desire, do what I can for the young man, and will support the weight of the whole Peloponnesus^g: for he has good parts, if there were but any disposition susceptible of instruction. Hitherto he shows none; yet there may be; or virtue is not to be taught; which I can never believe.

^f The Cælius here spoken of has been supposed to be one C. Cælius Caldus, who endeavoured, but in vain, to check the progress of Sylla in the former civil wars; but I do not find that this conjecture rests on any certain foundation. See letter 14 of this book.

LETTER XIII.

YOUR letter was particularly acceptable to my dear Tullia, and indeed to me. Your letters always bring something agreeable with them. Write, therefore; and if you can offer any ground of hope, do not omit it. You need not be alarmed at Antonius's lions¹. Nothing is pleasanter than this man. Listen to a trait worthy of a minister of state. He summoned the council of ten² from the free towns; and the four magistrates came to his residence early in the morning. First, he was asleep till nine o'clock: then, upon being told that the Neapolitans and Cumans were arrived (for Cæsar was displeased with these people), he ordered them to come again the next day, as he wanted to bathe, and was taking a lavement. This he did yesterday: and to-day he has determined to go over to Ænaria³. He promises to recall those that have been banished⁴. But omitting these matters, let me say something about myself. I have had a letter from Axius⁵. I am obliged to you for what you have done about Tiro. I am quite satisfied with Vectenus. I have paid the money⁶ to Vestorius. Servius is said to have slept at Minturnæ the 6th of May; to-day he was to lodge with C. Marcellus in Liternium; he will therefore reach me early to-morrow, and will furnish me with matter for writing to you; for I now find nothing to say. I am surprised that Antonius should not so much as send a message to me, especially as he has always been very civil. I suppose he does not choose to deny before my face his having received a harsh command concerning me. But I should not ask any favour⁷; nor, if I obtained it, should I place any reliance upon it. Yet I must devise something. Pray let me know if anything is done in Spain; for it might be heard by this time; and everybody is anxious, as supposing that, if things go right, there will be no further trouble. But for my part, I neither think that the preservation of Spain will decide the business, nor its loss render it desperate. I imagine Silius, and Ocella, and the others, are obliged to delay their departure. I perceive too that you are hindered by Curtius⁸; though I suppose you have⁹ a passport.

¹ Antonius is reported, but at a subsequent period, to have yoked lions to his carriage. He may at least have shown a fondness for them, and carried them about with him at this time. Cicero seems to mean that Antonius himself assumed so little of the character of the lion, that he condescended to amuse himself with low humour, beneath the dignity of his situation.

² The municipia, or towns admitted to the freedom of Roman citizens, were usually governed by a council of ten, and had besides four executive magistrates.

⁹ In the original there appears to have been some Greek word, which has undergone such mutilation from copyists and commentators, as to baffle all reasonable interpretation. The 17th letter of this book, which seems to have reference to this, makes it probable that Cicero meant in

LETTER XIV.

O WRETCHED existence! For to remain so long in fear, is a greater evil than the thing itself which is feared. Servius, as I before mentioned, having arrived the 7th of May, came to me the next day. Not to detain you unnecessarily, we came to no conclusion. I never saw anybody more disturbed by apprehension; nor in truth did he fear anything that was not a just cause of fear. That man¹ was angry with him, this² by no means pleased; and the victory of either party was to be dreaded, owing to the cruel disposition of the one³, the audacity of the other⁴, and the pecuniary difficulties of both, from which they can never be extricated but through the property of private individuals. This he said with so many tears, that I wondered they had not been dried up by such protracted misery. As for me, even this weakness of the eyes, which prevents my writing with my own hand, is unattended with any weeping⁵, though it is often so troublesome as to keep me awake. Collect, therefore, what consolation you can, and send it me; not from books and philosophy; for that I have at home; though somehow the remedy is less powerful than the disease: but do you rather find out what relates to Spain, and to Marseilles. Servius brings a sufficiently good report on these subjects, and says there is good authority for that of the two legions⁶. Let me then hear this from you, if you can, and other things of the same kind. Something must necessarily be known in a few days. But I revert to Servius. We adjourned our conversation to the next day. But he is loath to go out of the country. He would sooner bear whatever might happen, in his bed. He has a painful scruple arising from his son's joining the army before Brundisium⁷. This, however, he positively asserted, that if the exiles were restored, he would go into banishment himself. To this I replied, that that would certainly take place; and that what was now doing was not at all better; and I produced many instances. But this, instead of giving him encouragement, increased his fear; so that now it seems necessary rather to keep him in ignorance of my purpose, than to invite him to do the same. Therefore, there is not much to be expected from him. I shall think of Cælius, according to your suggestion.

LETTER XV.

WHILE Servius was with me, Cephalio arrived with your letter, on the tenth; which brought us great hope of better things respecting the eight cohorts; for they also which are in these parts, are said to waver. On the same day Funisulanus brought another letter from you, corroborating the same circumstance. On the subject of his own business I satisfied him amply, giving him to understand all his obligation to you. He has not yet paid me. He owes me a considerable sum, and is not supposed to be rich. He now says that he will pay it; but that one, who is in his books, delays: that, when this is paid, if there should be sufficient at your house, you may send it by the messengers. Philotimus's freed-man, Eros, will tell you how much it is. But let us return to greater matters. That Caelian business, which you wish for, ripens apace; and I am distracted with doubt whether I should wait for a favourable wind. There wants but a standard, and people will flock to it*. I am quite of your mind in thinking it best to go openly^a, and I think to set off accordingly: but I shall first wait for another letter from you. Nothing is to be got from Servius's opinion: every objection is raised to every proposal. He is the only man I have known of a more timid disposition than C. Marcellus, who regretted that he had been made consul. How dishonourable! He is said too to have confirmed Antonius in his opposition to my departure, that he might himself, I suppose, remain with the better grace. Antonius set out for Capua the tenth. He sent me word that he was prevented from waiting upon me by shame, because he thought I should be angry with him. I shall go then, and in the manner you advise, unless any hope should previously be afforded of sustaining some more important character^b. But this can scarcely happen so soon. Allienus the prætor however thinks that one of his colleagues will be appointed, if I am not. I care not who it is, so there be but somebody. I am pleased with what you mention about your sister. I take pains about young Quintus; and hope things are better. As for my brother Quintus, I assure you he is making every exertion to pay the interest that is due; but he has hitherto squeezed nothing out of L. Egnatius^c. Axius^d modestly applies for 12,000 (100%); for he has frequently written to desire I would advance to Gallius whatever he wants. But if he had not written, could I do otherwise? In truth I have repeatedly promised: but this money he wants immediately. I wish people^e would have consideration for me in these troubles. May the gods confound them! But of this at some other time. I rejoice at your being freed from your ague, and also Pilia. While the stores and other things are putting on board, I mean to run down to Pompeianum. I should be glad if you would make my acknowledgments to Vectenus for his attention. If you have anybody to send, let me hear from you before I go.

LETTER XVI.

I HAD just sent you a letter on a variety of subjects, when Dionysius came to me at an early hour. I should not only have shown myself ready to forgive him, but should have remitted the whole, if he had come in the temper of mind you described. For in the letter I received from you at Arpinum, you said that he would come, and would do whatever I desired. Now I desired, or rather wished, to have him with me. This he had positively refused, when he came to Formianum, which occasioned me to write to you angrily about him. He said very little; but the amount of his harangue was, that I would forgive him; that he was so embarrassed with his own affairs, that he was unable to go with me. I replied in a few words, but felt great vexation. I saw clearly that he despised my present fortune. What think you? Perhaps you will be surprised; but I must tell you that I reckon this among the greatest vexations of these times. I would have him continue your friend. The wishing you this, is wishing that all may go well with you: for just so long will his attachment last. I trust my design will be unattended with danger; for I shall both dissemble, and mean to keep a sharp look-out. Let but the passage be such as I wish; for the rest, so far as it is under the control of prudence, due care shall be taken. While I remain here, I should be glad if you would write me word not merely of what you know, or have heard, but also of what you foresee will happen. Cato, who might have kept Sicily without any difficulty, (and if he had kept it, all respectable people would have flocked to him) went from Syracuse the 24th of April, as Curio wrote me word. I wish, what is said, that Cotta may keep Sardinia. There is such a report. If it be so, poor Cato! In order to lessen any suspicion of my departure, or of my design, I went to Pompeianum the 12th, that I might remain there, while the things requisite for the voyage were got ready. Upon my arrival at the house, information was brought me that the centurions of three cohorts which are at Pompeii wished me to go thither the next day; it was my friend Ninnius communicated this to me; that they wished to deliver themselves and the town to me. But I, look you, was off on the morrow before it was light, that they might not so much as see me. For what was there in three cohorts? What if there had been more? How were they furnished? There occurred to me the same ideas upon that Caelian attempt which I read in the letter I received from you the same day, as soon as I arrived at Canninum; and yet it might only have been done to try me. I therefore removed all suspicion. Upon my

^a Atticus, we have seen, succeeded to the property of Cæcilius, who was a sort of banker; and I imagine the same business to have been continued on Atticus's account. Hence I understand this passage to mean, that if Funisulanus, after the money that was owing to him should have been paid, had enough at Atticus's banking-house to answer Cicero's claims, it might be sent down to him. [See book viii. letter 7, note m.] This receives considerable weight from what occurs in several letters of book xii., from which it appears that Atticus was a long time engaged with his accounts, so as to show that they must have been voluminous and intricate.

^b This may either mean, that there were many people dissatisfied with Caesar, and ready to unite under any leader in opposition to him: or, that many people were desirous of leaving Italy as soon as an opportunity offered.

^f Axius is mentioned before, in letter 11 of this book, as owing Cicero 13,000 sestertii on account of his son, who is probably the same Gallius here spoken of. And now he says, that Axius, instead of repaying the money, borrows 12,000 more, and wants it immediately.

return I find Hortensius has been here, and called to pay his respects to Terentia. He used very honourable language towards me. But I suppose I shall see him; for he sent his servant to say that he would call upon me. This is better than my colleague Antonius, whose mistress is carried in a litter in the midst of his lictors^f. Since you are free from the ague, and have shaken off not only the disease but even the languor attending it, let me see you in Greece looking quite well. In the mean time let me hear something from you.

LETTER XVII.

HORTENSIUS came to me the 14th, after my letter was written. I wish the rest of his conduct may correspond with this. His attention towards me is inconceivable, and of this I mean to avail myself^g. Afterwards came Serapio^h with your letter. But before I opened it, I told him that you had already written to me about him, as you had done. Then, when I had read the letter, I entered upon the rest very fully; and in truth I am much pleased with him, for he seems to be at once a man of learning and of probity. I think of employing his vessel also, and taking him with me. The weakness of my eyes has frequent returns, and though not very troublesome, yet it prevents my writing. I am glad your health is now both restored from its old complaint, and strengthened against any fresh attacks. I wish I had Ocellaⁱ here: for these matters seem to be rather more feasible. At present I am stopped by the equinox, which is very much out of its natural course^k. If this blows gently, I hope Hortensius will continue in the same disposition, for hitherto nothing could be more kind. You are surprised at my having spoken of a passport^l, as if I were charging you with I know not what offence; and cannot imagine how it should have come into my mind. But as you had mentioned an intention of going away, and I had understood that nobody was permitted to go without one, therefore I concluded you had one; as likewise because you had got a passport for the boys. This was the reason of the opinion I expressed. But I should be glad to know what you think of doing, and above all if there is yet any news. May 16.

LETTER XVIII.

My dear Tullia was brought to bed the 19th of May of a seven months' child. I rejoice in her safe delivery. The child is very weakly. The calms have hitherto delayed me surprisingly, and have been a greater impediment than the watch which is kept over me. For Hortensius's professions are all idle words, so that he must be a most base man. He has been corrupted by the freed-man Salvius. Henceforward therefore I shall not write to inform you what I am going to do, but what I have done. For all the Corycæi^m seem to listen to what I say. But still if there is anything from Spain, or anything else, pray continue to write; and do not expect to hear from me till I arrive at my destination, unless I send to you on my passage. But I write even this with fear: so slowly and difficultly has everything hitherto been done. As I laid ill the first beginning, so the rest follows. I am now proceeding to Formiæ. The Furies will perhaps pursue me by the same route. From the conversation which Balbus had with you, I do not approve of Malta. Do you then doubt of his reckoning me among the number of the enemies? I have written myself to Balbus, telling him that you had informed me of his good-will, and of his suspicion. For the one I have returned my thanks; on the other subject you must excuse me to him. Did you ever know anybody more unfortunate? I say no more, that I may not also distress you. I am worried to death with thinking that a time is arrived, when neither courage nor prudence can any longer avail me.

[In the interval between the tenth and eleventh books of Cicero's letters, it appears that he actually quitted Italy the 11th of June, and passed over to Dyrrachium, with his brother and the two young Ciceros, to join Pompeius. In the mean time Cæsar had made himself master of Spain; and having been created dictator at Rome, marched to Brundisium, and thence embarked the 4th of January in pursuit of Pompeius. At first Pompeius obtained some advantage over Cæsar before Dyrrachium, but was soon after totally defeated in the memorable battle of Pharsalia. Cicero was not present on this occasion, but remained at Dyrrachium out of health, and out of spirits. After this defeat Pompeius's party dispersed. The greater part went to renew the war in Africa, whither Cæsar also followed them. Some retired into Greece; but Cicero returned to Brundisium about the end of October, and from thence wrote the 5th letter of the following book.]

BOOK XI.

LETTER I.

I HAVE received from you a sealed packet^a brought by Anteros; but from which I have been able to learn nothing of my domestic affairs, about which I am deeply concerned. For he^b who has had the management of them is not there, nor do I know where in the world he is. But I place all hope of my reputation and private concerns in your kindness, which I have so often experienced. This if you will extend to me in these sad and desperate times, I shall bear with a better heart the dangers which are common to me with the rest; and that you will do so I conjure and entreat you. I have two-and-twenty hundred sestertia (17,600*l.*) in cistophori^c in Asia; by exchanging which money you will easily support my credit. Had I not thought that I left it quite clear, trusting to him^d whom you have long since ceased to trust, I would have waited a little longer, and not left my private affairs in embarrassment. The reason of my writing to you so late, is, that I have been late in finding what I had to apprehend. I beg you again and again to take me wholly under your protection; that if those, with whom I am^e, are safe, I may escape along with them, and may owe my safety to your kindness.

LETTER II.

I RECEIVED your letter the 4th of February, and the very same day I formally accepted the inheritance^a according to the will. Out of my many sad troubles one is removed, if, as you say, this inheritance is adequate to the support of my credit and reputation; which, however, even without this, I understand that you would have defended from your own means. As to what you mention respecting the dowry^b, by all the gods I conjure you to take the whole affair under your management, and to protect that poor creature^c (who is suffering by my fault and negligence) out of my property, if I have any; or by any means you can employ without putting yourself to inconvenience. Do not, I beseech you, suffer her to remain, as you say, destitute of everything. On what expenses has the produce of the farms been consumed? Nobody ever told me that those sixty sestertia (480*l.*) which you mention had been deducted from her dower; for I never would have suffered it. But this is the least of the injuries which I have received^a, and which my grief and tears prevent me from detailing to you. Of the money which I had in Asia, I have drawn out nearly one half^b. I thought it would be safer where it is than with the public renters^c. When you exhort me to keep up my spirits, I wish you could suggest anything that might enable me to do so. But if to my other miseries is added that also which Chrysippus said was in contemplation (you have not mentioned it) respecting my house^d, who is there more wretched than myself? I pray and beseech you, pardon me. I cannot write any more. You see how greatly I am afflicted. If this were common to me with the rest, who seem to be in the same case, my fnak would not appear so great, and would therefore be the more tolerable. There is now no source of comfort; unless you devise something, if indeed anything can be devised, that I may not be exposed to any peculiar calamity and insult. I have been later in sending back the courier, because there was no opportunity of sending. I have received from your agents seventy sestertia (560*l.*) in money, and the clothing^e that was wanted. I should be glad if you would write in my name to whom you think proper: you know my friends. If they expect my seal, or signature, you may tell them that I have avoided this, on account of the watch that is kept^f.

LETTER III.

WHAT is doing here you will be able to learn from the bearer of this letter, whom I have kept the longer because I have been in daily expectation of something new; though at present I have no other reason for writing, than that, about which you desired an answer, respecting what I would have done relative to the first of July^a. Either alternative is attended with difficulty in such difficult times; the risk of so large a sum; or, in this doubtful issue of events, that breaking off^b which ^f Cicero being now with Pompeius's army at Dyrrachium, was under the restriction of military discipline, and, if it is probable, might be watched with some jealousy.

^g This was probably the day on which some portion of his daughter's fortune became due to Dolabella. Cicero, as well as Tullia, was dissatisfied with Dolabella, and meditated a divorce. But considering Dolabella's credit with Caesar, it was difficult to determine, in the present doubtful state of affairs, whether to incur the danger of losing so large a sum, if he paid it; or to cut the matter short by suing for a divorce, and thereby making Dolabella his enemy.

^h The expression is probably borrowed from Atticus, and means the separating his daughter from her husband.

you mention. Therefore as other things, so this especially I commit to your protection and kindness, and to her judgment and inclination. I should have done better for my poor daughter, if I had formerly deliberated with you in person, rather^d than by letter, on the subject of my own security and circumstances. When you deny that any peculiar disadvantage attaches to me, though this affords no consolation, yet there are many peculiar circumstances which you must see to be, as they are, very grievous, and which I might easily have avoided. But these very things will be less, if, as has hitherto been done, they are lightened by your care and attention. The money is with Eg-natius. Let it remain on my account, as it is, (for things cannot long continue in their present state), that I may be able to see what is most expedient; though I am in want of everything; because he also^e with whom I am in difficulties, and I have advanced him a large sum of money, thinking that when matters are settled, this may likewise be an honour to me. I should be glad, if there are any persons to whom you think I ought to write, that you would execute this, as you have done before. Present my compliments to your family, and take care of your health. In the first place make every care and provision for what you mention; that nothing may be wanting to her^f for whom you know how uneasy I am. From the camp, June 13th.

LETTER IV.

I RECEIVED a letter by Isidorus, and two of later dates. From the last I find that the estates have not been sold^g. You will therefore see that she^h may be supported through you. With respect to Frusinasⁱ, if only I survive, it will be a convenient possession for me. You desire me to write, but I am prevented by want of matter, for I have nothing worth writing; entirely disapproving, as I do, both what happens, and what is doing. I wish I had formerly consulted you in person, rather than by letter. I support your cause here among these people as well as I can. Celer will tell you the rest. I have hitherto declined all office, the more so because it was impossible to do anything as became me and my circumstances^j. You ask what new has happened: you will be able to learn from Isidorus. What remains does not appear to be more difficult^k. I should be glad to have you take care (as you promise, and as you do) of what you know I have especially at heart^l. I am worn with anxiety, which has also brought on extreme bodily weakness. As soon as this is removed, I shall join the leader of the business, who is in great hope^m. Our friend Brutusⁿ engages zealously in the cause. So far I have been able to write with caution. Farewell. Respecting the second payment^o, pray consider with all attention what is to be done; as I observed in the letter which I sent by Pollex.

LETTER V.

I CANNOT without the greatest pain describe to you what causes, how bitter, how grievous, how unexpected, have moved me, and compelled me to act from a certain impulse of mind, rather than from consideration. They were such as have produced the effect you perceive^p. I therefore neither know what to tell you about my concerns, nor what to ask of you. You see the result and sum of the business. I have understood from your letters, both from that which you wrote in conjunction with others, and from that which was in your own name, (what indeed I perceived by myself), that your declining influence made you look out for some new means of defending me. As to what you propose of my coming nearer, and travelling through the towns by night, I do not well see how that can be done; for I have not such convenient resting-places, that I can pass in them all the day-time; nor is it of much consequence for the purpose of your inquiry, whether people see me in the towns or on the road. But yet I will consider, among other things, how this can best be done. My uneasiness both of mind and body is beyond belief, and makes me incapable of writing many letters: I have only answered those which I received. I wish you would write to Basilus, and to whomsoever you think proper, also to Servilius, in my name. That I should have written nothing to you in so long an interval, you will understand to arise from want of matter to write upon, not from want of inclination. Respecting your inquiry about Vatinius, I should not want his services, nor anybody's else, if they could find how to assist me. Quintus was at Patræ^q, in a disposition very hostile towards me. To the same place his son went from Corcyra. I imagine they are since gone from thence along with the rest^r.

LETTER VI.

I PERCEIVE your anxiety not only about your own, and the common calamities, but more particularly about me, and my affliction. And this my affliction is so far from being lessened, that it is even increased by associating yours with it. However, you see with your usual prudence to what source of consolation I am most open. For you approve of my determination^s, and declare that at such a time I could have done nothing better. You add also (what, though of less weight than your own judgment, yet has some weight with me) that the step which I have taken is approved by others also; that is, persons of consideration. If I thought this, I should be less afflicted. "Believe me," you say. I do believe you; but I know how desirous you are that my distress should be lightened. I have never regretted my withdrawing from the army: there was such a cruel spirit, such a co-operation with barbarous nations, that a proscription was contemplated not individually, but collectively; so that it was determined by common consent that the property of you all should be the prey of his victory; of you all, I say; for there was no thought even of you unmixed with cruelty. I shall never repent of my good-will¹; I do repent of the measures I adopted². I could wish that I had retired to some remote town till I was sent for. I should have created less observation, and should have received less vexation. I should not be exposed to this present trouble³. To lie miserably at Brundisium, is every way painful. How can I advance nearer, as you advise, without the lictors, which the people gave me, and which can never be taken from me but by violence. These with their fasces I lately mingled for a time in the crowd, as I approached the town, through fear of some insult from the soldiers. I contrived to get home in time⁴. I want you now to go to Oppius; and, provided it be thought right to advance with these lictors, I imagine they will authorise me to consider of it⁵. For so they engage; that Cæsar will have regard not only to the preservation of my dignity, but even to the increase of it; and they exhort me to be of good courage, and to entertain the best hopes. They give me the strongest assurance of what I should more readily credit if I had remained at home. But I am entering upon things that are past. Consider then, I beg you, what remains, and consult about it with these people; and, (if you think it expedient, and it meets with their approbation,) that Cæsar may be the more inclined to approve what I do, let it appear to be at their suggestion. Let Trebonius, Pansa, and any others, be admitted to this consultation, and let them write to inform Cæsar that what I have done, has been at their suggestion. I am quite alarmed at Tullia's illness and debility. I understand you are very kind to her, for which I am greatly obliged to you. I never had any doubt about Pompeius's fate⁶. For all princes and people were so impressed with the desperate state of his affairs, that wherever he had gone, I supposed this would happen. I cannot help lamenting his fall; for I knew him to be a man of integrity, virtue, and dignity. Should I offer to console you about Fannius⁷? He talked mischievously about your remaining. And L. Lentulus had already promised himself Hortensius's house, and Cæsar's gardens, and Baie. Just the same is done on this side, excepting that the other was boundless; for everybody who had staid in Italy was esteemed in the number of enemies. But some time or another I shall be glad to talk over these matters with my mind more at ease. I hear that my brother Quintus is gone into Asia to make his peace. Of his son I have heard nothing. Inquire of Diophanes, Cæsar's freed-man, whom I have not seen, but who brought that letter from Alexandria. He is reported to have seen him either on his journey, or already in Asia. I look for your letter, as the occasion demands; and hope you will take care to let it be brought to me with all expedition. November 28.

LETTER VII.

I THANK you for your letter, in which you have accurately stated everything which you supposed to concern me. It is settled therefore, according to the opinion you give me from these people, that I should continue to be attended by the same lictors, as it was granted to Sestius: though I apprehend he did not retain his original lictors, but had others given him by Cæsar. For I understand that he disallows such decrees of the senate, as were passed subsequently to the departure of the tribunes. If therefore he chooses to be consistent with himself, he may still approve of my lictors. But what have I to do with lictors, who am almost ordered to quit Italy? For Antonius sent me the copy of a letter he had received from Cæsar, in which it was stated that he had heard of Cato's and L. Metellus's arrival in Italy, with the design of living openly in Rome; that he did not like this, from fear of its occasioning some disturbance; and that all should be excluded from Italy, except those whose case he should himself have heard: and he expressed himself on this subject with great warmth. Therefore Antonius wrote to me requesting that I would pardon him, but that he was not at liberty to disobey these instructions. Upon this I sent L. Lamia to explain to him that Cæsar had desired Dolabella to write to me, pressing me to come to Italy as soon as possible, and that I had come agreeably to his letter. He then issued an order to except me and Lælius by name; which I was sorry for, as he might have excepted us in fact, without publicly naming us. O the many heavy causes of uneasiness! which you kindly endeavour to alleviate, and not without effect; for you do indeed lessen my affliction by the very circumstance of your taking such pains to lessen it; and this I trust you will not think it burdensome to do very often. You will especially attain your purpose, if you can bring me to think that I have not entirely lost the good opinion of respectable people. Yet what can you do in this respect? Nothing, truly. But if circumstances should give you any opportunity, this will afford me the best consolation. It cannot be done at present; but if anything should arise in the course of events: like what has happened now. For it was said that I ought to have gone with Pompeius, but his fate lessens the reproach of having neglected that duty. So of all things nothing is more censured, than that I should not have gone into Africa : but I considered that the republic ought not to be defended by the barbarous troops of a faithless nation, especially against an army that had gained repeated victories. This perhaps will not be approved. For I hear that many good men are arrived in Africa ; and I know there were many before. I am very much pressed on this subject. Here then I stand in need of some favourable chance. It may be that some, or possibly all of them, may prefer their safety to the issue of war. For if they persevere, and gain their cause, you see in what a condition I shall be. You will say, what will be their condition if they are defeated ? It will at least be a more honourable wound. These considerations distract me. You do not say why you do not prefer Sulpicius's determination to mine : for though it is less glorious than Cato's, it is however exempt both from danger and from remorse. The last thing to be considered, is the situation of those who are in Greece. However, these are so far better off, than I am, that they are together in considerable number ; and whenever they come to Italy, they will come to their own home. Continue, as you do, to soften these matters, and to conciliate as many as you can. When you excuse yourself^b, I am well aware of your reasons, and consider it for my interest that you should be there^c, if it be only to manage for me, as you have hitherto done, what can be managed, with those in authority. In the first place I should be glad if you would attend to this : I apprehend there are many who have or will accuse me to Cæsar, as either repenting of the step I have taken^d, or disapproving what is done. And though both are true, yet these persons assert it out of ill-will towards me, not that they have any knowledge of its being so. But that Balbus and Oppius may defend me against all such attacks, and by their frequent letters may confirm Cæsar's kind disposition ; that this may effectually be done, you will use all diligence. Another reason why I should be sorry to have you leave Rome is, that you say you have been entreated^e—"O sad business ! What should I write ? or what should I desire ? I shall be very short, for my tears burst forth. I commit it to you, and beg you to take it under your care. Only see that, at such a time, it involve you in no difficulty. Pardon me, I beseech you : I can dwell no longer on this subject for my tears and grief. I will only say, that nothing can be more gratifying to me than your affection towards her. You do kindly in undertaking to write to whom you think it proper. I have met with a person who saw Quintus the son at Samos, the father at Sicyon. Their excuse is easily made. I wish they, who have seen Cæsar before me, may be as ready to promote my interest with him, as I should be to promote theirs, if I had any opportunity. When you ask me to take it in good part, if there should be anything in your letter that vexes me, I do take it in the very best part ; and request you to tell me everything without disguise, as you do ; and to do it as often as possible. Farewell.

LETTER VIII.

THOUGH you perceive indeed how greatly I am afflicted, yet you will know it from Lepta and Trebatius. I pay severely the penalty of my rashness^a, which you would fain persuade me is prudence : nor do I prevent your disputing the point, and writing to me as often as possible. For your letters afford me some comfort at this time. You must use every exertion through those who wish well to me, and have influence with Cæsar, particularly through Balbus and Oppius, that they may write on my behalf with all diligence. For, as I hear, I am attacked both by some in person, and by letters. These must be met, as the importance of the occasion demands. Furnius^b is there very unfriendly towards me ; and Quintus has sent his son not only to make his own peace, but to accuse me. He gives out that I have traduced him to Cæsar ; which is refuted by Cæsar himself and all his friends ; and yet he does not cease, wherever he goes, to heap all sorts of reproaches upon me. Nothing ever happened to me so unaccountable, nothing in all these troubles so painful. Some atrocious things were related to me by those who had heard him talking openly at Sicyon in the hearing of many people. You know his manner ; perhaps you have experienced it. It is all turned against me. But I add to my uneasiness by speaking of it, and make you uneasy too. Therefore I return to my subject, and beg you to let Balbus send somebody expressly for this purpose^c. I should be glad if you would write in my name to whom you think fit. Farewell. December 27.

LETTER IX.

I HAVE indeed acted both incautiously, as you observe, and more hastily than I ought, and am out of all hope^a, being kept by these exceptions^b to the edicts. If they had not been made, through your care and kindness, I might be at liberty to go into some unfrequented place : now I cannot even do this. What advantage is it to have arrived before the tribunes enter upon their office^c, if the coming at all is of no advantage ? What can I hope from him^d, who has never been a friend to me ; since I am already undone and crushed by this law ? Balbus's letters to me become daily less encouraging ; and there may probably be many from many quarters to Cæsar against me. I am ruined by own fault. No part of my troubles has been brought on by accident; everything is the effect of folly. For when I saw the nature of the contest; that all was unprepared, and feeble, against troops in the highest order; I separated^a from them (what could I do?), and adopted counsels not so much bold, as allowable^b for me beyond other men. I yielded to my friends, or rather I obeyed them. Of one of them, him whom you^c commend to me, you will see the disposition from his own letters which he has sent to you and to others, and which I should never have opened but from the following circumstances. A parcel was brought to me, which I undid, to see if there was any letter for myself; which there was not. There was one to Vatinius, and another to Ligurius, which I ordered to be taken to them. They presently called upon me burning with grief, crying out upon the perfidy of the man. They read to me the letters, filled with all sorts of calumnies against me. Ligurius was quite in a rage, saying that he knew Cæsar had hated him; yet had not only shown him kindness, but had also given him so much money, out of regard to me. After receiving this shock, I was desirous of knowing what he had written to others; for I considered that it would be prejudicial to himself, if this great guilt of his should be generally known. I found they were all of the same kind. I have sent them to you, that if you think it desirable for him that they should be delivered, you may deliver them; no harm will accrue to me; for as to their being opened, I imagine Pomponia has his seal. It was his using this bitterness when we first set sail, which so affected me, that I was afterwards quite sunk: and now he is said to be solicitous not so much for himself as against me. Thus am I pressed by all circumstances; which I am hardly able, or rather quite unable, to bear^d. Amongst these distresses there is one equivalent to all the rest, that I shall leave my poor daughter plundered of her patrimony, and all her fortune. I should therefore be particularly glad to see you, as you promise; for I have nobody else to whom I can commend her; as I understand her mother is threatened with the same dangers^e as myself. But if you should not find me, yet let this be a sufficient commendation, and do you, as far as you can, mollify her uncle towards her. I write this on my birth-day; when I wish that I had never been born; or that my mother had produced nothing afterwards. I am prevented by tears from writing more.

^a The word activeram in this place evidently comes from scisco, and though I do not find any corresponding signification of it, I suspect it is here equivalent to desciveram, and have translated it accordingly.

^b It would have argued more courage to join either of the contending parties; but Cicero was excusable in not joining Pompeius, with the hope of acting as a mediator of peace; and his obligations to Pompeius were such as forbade his co-operating with Cæsar.

^c Quintus, in whose favour I suppose Atticus might have written to Cicero upon finding him angry at his brother's behaviour.

^d Has not this expression, as well as what immediately follows, allusion to thoughts of destroying himself? such as we find him uttering under the affliction of his banishment in the third book.

^e The danger of having her goods forfeited.

LETTER X.

To my inconceivable distresses there has been a fresh addition from what has been related to me respecting the two Quintuses. P. Terentius, a friend of mine, has had a good deal to do as deputy contractor for the customs and revenues in provincial Asia. He met with Quintus the son at Ephesus the 13th of December, and particularly invited him to his house through friendship to me. Having made inquiries from him about me, he said the young man informed him that he was very angry with me, and showed him a roll of paper containing a speech which he intended to make to Cæsar against me. Terentius said what he could to check his senseless conduct. Afterwards, at Patræ, Quintus the father talked to him a great deal in a similar strain of slander. You are acquainted with his extravagance by the letters which I sent you. I am sure this must give you pain; to me it is most distressing, and the more so, because I imagine there will be no room for me even to expostulate with them. On the state of things in Africa, I hear accounts very different from what you mention. For they say nothing can be more steady, or better prepared; add to this, Spain^f, and the disaffection in Italy, the declining strength and zeal of the legions, and the confusion in the city^g. Where can I find any tranquillity^h, but while I am reading your lettersⁱ; which would no doubt be more frequent, if you had anything to offer by which you thought my cares could be lessened. But I beg you not to omit writing to me whatever happens; and those^j who are so cruelly hostile to me, you may blame at least, if you cannot hate them; not with the expectation of doing any good; but to let them see that you love me. I will write more to you when you have answered my last letter. Farewell. January 21.

LETTER XI.

I AM so exhausted with the torment of my great distresses, that if there were anything upon which I ought to write to you, I should not easily be able to execute it; much less then, when I have nothing to tell you, when especially there is not even any prospect of things becoming better. So that I am no longer anxious even for your letters, though they always bring something agreeable with them. Therefore continue to write, whenever you have an opportunity of sending. I have nothing to reply to your last, which I received now a long time ago. For in this interval I find that everything is changed; the right cause has acquired strength, and I pay the heavy penalty of my folly^k. I must procure for P. Sallustius thirty sestertia (240*l.*), which I received from Cn. Sallustius. I shall be ⁱ Alluding, no doubt, to his brother and nephew.

^f Since Cæsar's rapid subjection of Spain, fresh insurrections had broken out there.

^g Considerable disturbances had arisen between the tribes.

^h In consequence of Cicero's return to Italy he had as much to apprehend from the success of Pompeius's party, as from that of Cæsar's.

^j Pompeius's party was in considerable force in Africa and Spain, and Cicero suspected that he had acted precipitately in offending them by his return to Italy.

obliged to you to see that they are provided without delay. I have written about it to Terentia. Even this is now almost gone. I wish therefore you would arrange with her, that I may have enough for present use. I shall perhaps be able to take it up here, if I only know that it will be supplied at Rome. But without knowing that, I have not ventured to do so. You see the state of all my affairs. There is no sort of misfortune which I do not suffer and apprehend. And the misery of this is the greater, in proportion to the greatness of my folly. He^w does not cease to slander me in Greece; so that your letters have been of no avail. Farewell. March 8.

LETTER XII.

CEPHALIO delivered your letter to me the 8th of March in the evening; and the same day in the morning I had despatched a messenger with a letter to you. Nevertheless, upon reading your letter, I have thought it right to make some reply, especially as you express yourself doubtful what excuse I shall make to Caesar for my going away at the time when I quitted Italy. I have no occasion for any new excuse: for I have repeatedly told him by letter, and have sent word by several persons, that I was unable, if I wished it, to bear the reflections that were made upon me; with many things to the same effect. There was nothing that I less wished him to suppose, than that I had not acted upon my own judgment in a thing of such moment. Afterwards, upon hearing from Balbus Cornelius the younger, that he conceived my brother Quintus to have been the trumpet to my march, for so he expressed himself, before I knew what Quintus had been writing to so many people about me; though he had said, and done, many severe things to me in person, yet I wrote notwithstanding^z to Caesar in these words: "I am no less anxious for my brother Quintus, than for myself; but in my present situation I cannot venture to commend him to you. So much however I shall venture to ask of you, that I beg you will not suppose he has done anything to lessen my duty and affection towards you; but has always rather contributed to unite us together; and has been the companion, not the adviser, of my going away. Therefore in other matters you will attribute to him whatever your kindness and the friendship between you demands. That I may be no detriment to him in your esteem, I earnestly entreat of you again and again." If then I should have any meeting with Caesar, though I do not doubt but he will be kind towards him, as he has already declared, yet I shall behave in the same manner as I have always done. But, as I see, I have much more reason to be concerned about Africa; which you represent as being daily confirmed in the hope of making terms, rather than of victory. I wish this were so: but I understand it is very much otherwise, and apprehend that you are yourself of that opinion, only write differently, not with a view to deceive me, but to encourage me; especially when to Africa is joined Spain likewise^y. Respecting your recommendation of writing to Antonius and others; if you think it necessary, I should be glad if you would do this which you have often done before. For nothing occurs to me that I ought to write. If you hear that I am unreasonably broken in spirit, what think you, when you find these noble^a actions of my son-in-law added to my former troubles? However, I hope you will not cease to write to me, as often as you can, although you should have nothing to write about. For your letters always bring me some comfort. I have formally accepted Galio's legacy. I suppose it was a simple inheritance, since no form has been sent me. March 8.

LETTER XIII.

I HAVE hitherto received no letter by Muræna's freed-man. P. Siser brought that which I am now answering. What you mention about the letter of the elder Servius, and what you say of certain people having brought information of Quintus's arrival in Syria, are neither of them true. In reply to your inquiry, how those, who have come hither, are, or have been affected towards me, I have understood that nobody has manifested any disrespect. But how little this signifies to me, I am quite sure you can judge. In my present grief everything is intolerable to me; and nothing more so, than that I find myself in a situation, where the only things that are apparently desirable^b, are what I have always disapproved. P. Lentulus the father is said to be at Rhodes; the son at Alexandria; and C. Cassius, it appears, is gone from Rhodes to Alexandria. Quintus offers me some explanation by letter, but in terms more bitter than his heaviest accusation. For he says that he has understood from your letters, that you were displeased with his having written to several people so unkindly about me; and that he is sorry he should have given you any uneasiness, but that he had done what was right. Then he details most foully the causes of his doing so. But neither at this time, nor before, would he have manifested his hatred towards me, unless he saw me to be every way distressed. I wish that even by travelling in the night, as you proposed. I had approached nearer to you. I can now form no conjecture either when, or where, I am likely to see you. There was no occasion for your writing to me about the co-heirs of Fufidius: for what they ask is just in itself; and whatever you had done I should have been satisfied with it. You have long since known my wish of redeeming the Frusinian estate^c; though at that time my affairs were in a better condition, and I did not think my case so desperate; yet I have still the same wish. You will consider how this may be accomplished. And I should be glad, as far as you can, that you would secure me supplies for my necessary expenses. What means I had, I presented to Pompeius at a time when I thought I did it prudently. For which purpose I then both took it from your bailiff, and borrowed elsewhere; while Quintus complained by letter that I had given nothing to him; though he never asked me, nor have I beheld the money myself. But I wish you would see what there is, that can be done^c, and what advice you can give me about everything; for you know the state of my affairs. My affliction prevents my writing more. If there is anything, which you think should be written to anybody in my name, I should be glad if you would do it as usual. Whenever you have an opportunity of sending a letter to me, I hope you will not omit it. Farewell.

LETTER XIV.

I AM far from being offended with the honest truth conveyed in your letter; in which you do not even attempt to console me, as formerly, under the general, and particular calamities, which I suffer; but acknowledge that it can no longer be done. For things are not now, as they were before, when, to say nothing more, I thought I had companions and associates. But all who were supposed to be making their peace in Greece and in Asia, both those who knew the state of affairs^d, and those who did not, are said to be going into Africa. So that, besides Lælius, I have no partner in my fault^e; and even he is so far better off, as he has been received^f. About myself however, I do not doubt but Cæsar has already written to Balbus and to Oppius; from whom I should have heard, if there had been anything good; and they would also have spoken with you. But I wish you would confer with them upon this subject, and let me know what answer they give you. Not that a grant of safety from Cæsar can have any assurance; but yet it will afford an opportunity of consideration and forecast. Though I dread the sight of everybody, especially with such a son-in-law^g; yet in such great troubles I do not see what else^h I should wish for. Quintus still goes onⁱ, as both Pansa informs me and Hirtius. He^k too is said to be on his way to Africa with the rest. I will write to Minucius the father, and will send your letter. I will let you know if he does anything^l. I wonder that you should have been able to send thirty sestertia (240*l.*), unless it have arisen from the Fufidian estate. Yet I see it is so^m. I look for you; whom I should be particularly glad to see, if it can any how be managed; for the occasion demands it. The last act is already drawing to a conclusionⁿ; when it is easy to judge more soundly what everything really is^o. Farewell.

^m That Atticus had directed Minucius to let Cicero have

LETTER XV.

As you produce sufficient reason why I cannot see you at this time, pray what ought I to do? For Cæsar seems to hold Alexandria in such a manner^p that he is ashamed even of writing about what is done there. But it looks as if the opposite party would soon pass over from Africa^q; the Greeks^r, also, will return from Asia to join them, or will remain in some neutral place. What, therefore, do you think I ought to do? I see that it is a difficult question: for I am alone, or with one other, and can neither return to that party nor derive any degree of hope from this. But I am desirous at least of knowing what you think; and this among other things made me wish to see you, if it could be done. I informed you before that Minucius had furnished me with only twelve sestertia (120*l.*); I should be glad if you could secure the payment of the rest. Quintus has written to me not only without asking pardon, but with great bitterness: the son with a degree of hatred which is surprising. No sort of evil can be imagined with which I am not assailed. Yet everything is more tolerable than the sense of my own error, which is both strong and constant. If I were to have those companions in my error which I expected, yet it would be but a slender consolation. But every body's conduct besides admits of some excuse; mine admits of none. Some have been captured, some intercepted, so as not to call in question their attachment,—especially when, upon being at liberty, they have rejoined their party. Even those who voluntarily delivered themselves up to Papius^s can only be charged with timidity; and there are that money, which he would replace with Minucius's correspondent at Rome.

ⁿ So I understand the original, which is concise and thence obscure. It may be worth while here to advert to the force of the present passive, expressive of that which is in the act of being done. The want of a corresponding tense in English has sometimes occasioned a misapprehension of the just meaning in both Greek and Latin authors; as Luke ix. 51, "Ἐν τῷ συμπληροῦναι τὰς ἡμέρας ἀνελθὲν αὐτοῦ"—"When the days of his being received up into heaven were drawing towards their accomplishment"—not, as in the common translation, "when the time was come."

^o This seems to me to have been generally misunderstood; I conceive it to allude to the denouement of a stage play, like what is said afterwards in letter 19 of this book, "Jam enim mihi videtur adesse extremum."

^p Cæsar, seduced by the charms of Cleopatra, was engaged in a war to support her cause in Egypt against her brother Ptolemaeus.

^q Egypt and Africa are generally distinguished by the Roman writers, the latter signifying that part which was reduced to a Roman province. Here, the party in Africa means the army attached to Pompeius's cause, who were in force in the neighbourhood of Carthage, from whence Cicero apprehended they might make an attack upon Italy.

^r These Greeks are those of Pompeius's party, who had fled into Asia Minor after the battle of Pharsalia.

many of various descriptions who, whenever they apply to them, will readily be received. You need the less wonder, therefore, that I cannot support such a weight of affliction: for my error alone admits of no reparation,—and perhaps Lælius's; but how does that help me? They say that C. Cassius has¹ changed his intention of going to Alexandria. These things I detail to you, not that you can remove my trouble, but that I may know whether you have anything to offer about what preys upon me. In addition to all the rest is my son-in-law, and these other matters, of which I cannot write for weeping. I am vexed too about Æsopus' son². In short I am completely miserable. But to return to my first point; what do you think is to be done? Should I try to come nearer to you unobserved? or should I cross the sea? For it is impossible to remain here much longer. Why can nothing be settled about the Fufidian estates? For the nature of the conditions was such as is not usually disputed; since the portion which appears too little may easily be made up by a valuation. It is not without reason that I make these inquiries; for I suspect the co-heirs may think my situation very doubtful, and may on that account keep the business in suspense. Farewell. May 14.

LETTER XVI.

It is not by my fault at this time (though before I have been faulty enough) that I derive no consolation from that letter³: for it is written in a meagre style, and bears strong marks of not coming from Cæsar, which I imagine you must have perceived. About meeting him, I will do as you advise⁴; for there is no great expectation of his arrival; and those who come from Asia say that nothing has been heard about peace,—in the hope of which I have fallen into this error⁵. I see nothing to be hoped,—now, especially, when such a wound has been received in Asia, in Illyricum, in the affair of Cassius⁶, in Alexandria itself, in Rome, in Italy. For my part, even if he should come back notwithstanding the war⁷ in which he is still said to be engaged, yet I apprehend the business will be settled⁸ before his return. As to what you mention of a certain degree of joy being excited in all good people upon the news of Cæsar's letter, you indeed omit nothing which you think can be any source of comfort; but I cannot persuade myself that any good man would think my safety worth the begging it of Cæsar, and the rather because I have now no companion in such a course. Those in Asia wait for the issue of events; the Greeks afford a hope of pardon to Fufius himself⁹. These people had at first the same fear as I, and adopted the same resolution; but the delay at Alexandria has righted their cause¹⁰ and overset mine. Therefore I still request of you, as in my former letters, that if you see anything in my ruined condition which you think I ought to do, you will inform me. If I am received by Cæsar's party (which you see is not the case), yet as long as the war lasts I am uncertain what I should do or whither I should go. But if I am cast off, the difficulty is still greater. I look, therefore, for a letter from you, and beg you will write explicitly. With regard to your advice of writing to Quintus on the occasion of this letter,—I would do it if the letter gave me any satisfaction. Though somebody wrote to me lately in the following terms: "In these troubles I am not sorry to be at Patras. I should be there with more satisfaction if your brother spoke of you in a way that I liked to hear." When you say that he complained of my not writing to him,—I once only received a letter from him, to which I sent an answer by Cephalio, who was detained several months by contrary weather. I have before mentioned to you that Quintus the son had written to me with great rudeness. The last thing I have to beg of you is, that if you think it right, and can undertake it, you would join with Camillus in speaking to Terentia about her will¹¹. The times require that she should consider of it, and give satisfaction where it is due. I have understood from Philotimus that she is guilty of some great¹² misconduct, which I can scarcely believe. But at all events, if anything can be done, it must be looked to. I long to hear from you about everything, especially what you may say about her. Upon this I want your opinion, even if you have nothing to propose; for I shall consider that as conclusive. June 3.

LETTER XVII.

I SEND this by another person's messenger who is in a hurry to set off: for this reason it will be the shorter, and because I am going to send one of my own. My dear Tullia came to me the twelfth of June, and acquainted me with the numerous instances of your attention and kindness to her, and brought me three letters. But I not only

² By Cæsar's delay at Alexandria the Greeks had time to recover from their first alarm, and to observe the actual progress of affairs. Cicero, who had acted upon the presumption of Cæsar's superiority, now found himself in a difficult strait.

³ Terentia's conduct and extravagance had now made Cicero resolve upon a divorce. And in such a case, where there were children, it was the custom for each party to make a settlement by will on their common offspring, proportioned to their several estates. For when a wife was not guilty of infidelity, her dowry was restored to her.

² Æsopus the actor had been received into familiarity by Cicero, but his son was a profligate.

³ A letter pretending to come from Cæsar.

⁴ Atticus seems to have advised him not to put himself forward in saluting Cæsar on his return.

⁷ The war in Egypt.

⁸ Cicero was apprehensive of the army in Africa getting possession of Italy, in opposition to Cæsar.

could not take that pleasure which I ought in the virtue, gentleness, and affection of an exemplary daughter, but was even touched with inconceivable grief at the thought of such a mind being involved in so sad a fortune,—and that by no fault of hers, but by my egregious folly. Now, therefore, I neither expect consolation from you, which I know you are anxious to administer, nor advice, for which there is no room. I perceive, indeed, both by your former letter and by the last, that you have tried everything. I think of sending Cicero^f to Cæsar with Sallustius. I see no reason why I should detain Tullia here any longer in such a state of general affliction: I therefore mean to send her back to her mother as soon as she will let me. In return for your letter of consolation^g, suppose me to have said what your own understanding suggests as proper for the occasion. What you mention of Oppius's conversation^h is quite consonant with my suspicion; yet, speak as I might, I should never persuade these people that I approved of their conduct. However, I will observe what moderation I can; though I see not what it signifies to me if I should incur their displeasure. I find you have just cause to prevent your coming to me,—for which I am very sorry. Nobody brings any account of Cæsar's departure from Alexandria. It is certain that no person has come from thence since the 15th of March, nor has any letter been received from him since the 13th of December; by which you see that the affair of the letterⁱ dated February 9 (which, even if it were genuine, would be of little account), is not true. I understand that L. Terentius is come from Africa, and has arrived at Pæstum. I should like to know what intelligence he brings, and how he got away^j, and what is doing in Africa. He is reported to have been despatched by Nasidius. If you find out how this is, I wish you would let me know. Respecting the ten sestertia (80*l.*), I will do as you direct. Farewell. June 14.

LETTER XVIII.

THERE is yet no rumour of Cæsar's departure from Alexandria; on the contrary, it is believed that he is fully occupied. I shall not, therefore, send my son, as I had intended; and must beg of you to extricate me from hence^k: for any penalty is better than continuing here. Upon this subject I have written to Antonius, and to Balbus, and to Oppius. For whether there be war in Italy by land or by sea, it is by no means desirable for me to be here. Both of these may possibly happen; certainly one of them. I learned from your account

^f His son.

^g The text here is obscure, and perhaps faulty; but I think it intelligible without any conjectural emendations, which should never be admitted unnecessarily.

^h The context leads one to suppose that Oppius, who was of Cæsar's party, objected to Cicero's freedom of speech.

ⁱ That, of which Cicero speaks in letter 16 of this book.

^j Scipio, who had the command of the sea-coast, prohibited all passengers, through fear of their establishing an intercourse with Cæsar.

^k Cicero was still at Brundisium, whence he could not depart without danger of giving offence by retaining his lieutenants, or of dishonouring his rank by dismissing them. See above, letter 6 of this book.

of Oppius's conversation what was their plan^l of proceeding; but I beg you to make them alter it. I expect nothing whatever but what is miserable; yet nothing can be worse than my present situation. I wish you, therefore, to speak to Antonius and those others, and to expedite this business as you can. Write to me about everything as soon as possible. Farewell. June 20.

LETTER XIX.

(Græc. xxv.)

I READILY assent to your letter, in which you say, in many words, that you have no advice to offer that can be of service to me. There is assuredly no consolation that can alleviate my suffering. For nothing has happened by accident, else it might be borne; but I have occasioned everything by those errors and distresses of both mind and body, which I wish my nearest connexions^m had chosen to heal rather than to aggravate. Since no hope is afforded me either of your advice or of any consolation, I will not hereafter ask it of you. I trust, however, that you will not cease to write,—but will let me know whatever occurs to your mind, whilst you have anybody to send or there is anybody to send toⁿ,—which will not be very long. There is a doubtful report of his^o having left Alexandria; which arose from a letter of Sulpicius, and has received confirmation from all the subsequent accounts. Whether it be true or false is of so little moment to me, that I know not which I should prefer. What I wrote to you some time since about the^p will I wish they could place among the adverse letters. I am quite distressed at the wretched means of this poor creature^q; I think nothing ever happened like it,—and wish you could point out to me any way in which I might assist her. I see the same difficulty which there was in giving advice before. But this object disturbs me beyond everything. I was blind in the second payment of her fortune. I wish somebody else,—but it is now past. I beg you, in these ruinous circumstances, if anything can be raised and got together out of my plate, with some part of my furniture, so as to be in security, that you would pay attention to it. For things seem to be drawing to a conclusion without any conditions of peace; and the present state, even without an enemy, is incapable of subsisting. You may take an opportunity, if you think fit, of talking with Terentia upon these matters. I cannot write all that I feel. Farewell. July 5th.

^l This probably relates to Cæsar's lieutenants in Italy, who acted, he says, as if they were determined to keep him shut up in Brundisium, being perhaps unwilling to determine anything about his lieutenants till they should receive instructions from Cæsar. He applies to Atticus to procure authority for his removal without compromising his dignity.

^m Alluding in the first place to his brother, and perhaps also to Dolabella and Terentia.

ⁿ Said in a sort of despair of his being able to support his troubles. See letter 9 of this book, note 7. ^o Cæsar.

^p See letter 16 of this book. The subsequent line is of very doubtful interpretation. It may perhaps allude to some expression of Atticus, or his friends, calling the letter of Cicero in which he spoke of his will, as one of his croaking letters.

^q His daughter Tullia; for in the very next, and several other letters, he speaks of her in similar terms.

LETTER XX.

(Græv. xxiii.)

CAMILLUS has informed me that you had spoken to him on the subject, about which I wrote^a to beg you would communicate with him. I am now expecting to hear from you; though if it is otherwise than it ought to be, I do not see how it can be altered: but having received a letter from him^b, I want one from you also; and conclude that you had not learned all you wished,—provided only that you are well; for you mentioned your being attacked with some kind of indisposition. One Acusius arrived from Rhodes the 24th of June, and brought word that Quintus the son had set out to join Cæsar the 29th of May; and that Philotimus had arrived at Rhodes the day before with a letter^c for me. You will hear Acusius himself,—but he travels slowly; in consequence of which I shall deliver my letter to a more expeditious messenger. What may be in Cæsar's letter I know not; but my brother Quintus highly congratulates me. To say the truth, so great has been my error that I can obtain nothing, even in imagination, which can be tolerable to me. I entreat you to think about this poor creature^d, and (what I lately mentioned to you) that something may be made up to secure her from want, and likewise about this will. I wish also that I had attended before to that other business^e, but I was afraid of everything. There was nothing better in this deplorable situation than a separation. I should then have done something, like one alive^f,—whether the cause assigned were the law for expunging debts, or the nightly violence, or his commerce with Metella, or all together^g. Her property would not then have been lost, and I should have appeared to feel a becoming indignation. I well remember your letter; but I remember also that time: though anything was preferable. Now he seems himself to threaten it^h; for I hear such things respecting the state of the republicⁱ; O gods! My son-in-law especially! That he should do this; even expunge all former debts! I think with you, therefore, that a bill of divorce should be sent. He will perhaps demand the third instalment of her dower. Consider, therefore, whether I should wait till it originate with himself, or whether I should anticipate him. If it be any how possible, even by travelling at night, I will try to see you. I hope you will write to me upon these matters, and anything else which it may concern me to know. Farewell.

LETTER XXI.

(Græv. xix.)

HAVING an opportunity of writing by your servant, I would not let it slip, though I have nothing to say. You write to me less frequently than you used, and shorter,—which I impute to your having nothing that you think I can like to read or to hear. But if there is anything, of whatever kind it may be, I should wish you to let me know it. The only thing that would be desirable for me is, if anything can be done respecting a peace,—of which in truth I entertain no hope. Yet since you sometimes slightly mention it, you compel me to hope for what is hardly within the compass of my wishes. Philotimus is expected the middle of August: I know nothing more about him. I shall be glad to receive your answer to what I mentioned to you in a former letter^b. I have yet time enough in the midst of calamities to use some precaution, though I have hitherto never used any. Farewell. July 22.

LETTER XXII.

(Græv. xxiv.)

WHAT you some time since mentioned to me, and what you have twice repeated in your letters to Tullia about me, I perceive to be true. And I am the more miserable (though my wretchedness appeared to admit of no addition) because I not only must not resent the great injury I have received^c; but cannot even lament it with impunity. Therefore I must try to bear it. But when I have borne it, yet all the calamities are to be sustained, which you caution me to prevent^d. For such is the offence I have committed, that in every state of affairs, and under every party, it is likely to be attended with the same consequence^e. But I shall proceed in my own hand^f, since what follows demands secrecy. See, I beseech you, even now about the will. The idea of its having been made at the time when she began to inquire, did not I imagine strike you (else she would not have asked), neither did it strike me. Yet, as if it were so, having once entered upon the subject, you may advise her to entrust it to somebody, whose fortune is exempt from the hazard of this war. I should like, above all, that it might be to you, if she is of the same mind. I conceal from the poor creature that in this I am apprehensive of that other danger^g. I am well aware that nothing can be sold now; but things may be laid by and secreted, so as to escape that ruin which hangs

^b This probably alludes to Cicero's speaking too freely upon the state of affairs; which is mentioned more distinctly in the latter part of this letter, and was before noticed in letter 17 of this book.

^c His not being at liberty to quit Brundisium.

^d The danger of giving offence to Cæsar.

^e Cicero conceived that Cæsar was so much displeased with his having joined Pompeius, and the Pompeians with his having deserted them, that his own ruin would ensue either way.

^f The former part of his letter being written by an amanuensis.

^g The confiscation of his property, in apprehension of which he wished to have Terentia's settled by will, and

^a Namely, the urging Terentia to make her will. See letter 16 of this book.

^b The context appears sufficiently to warrant the reading with Manutius, ab illo. The text of this letter seems to be faulty in several parts.

^e The business of his daughter's divorce.

^f Alive to his situation.

^g Any, or all of these offences on the part of Dolabella, would have justified Cicero in suing for a divorce for his daughter.

^h In which it is to be supposed that Atticus advised Tullia's divorce.

ⁱ By his conduct, regardless of all propriety.

over us. For when you say that my own property will be ready for my use, and yours for Terentia; yours I grant; but what can there be of mine? Respecting Terentia however (to pass by all other grievances, which are innumerable), what can be worse than this? You had written to her to send a bill of exchange for twelve sestertia (100*l.*), this being what remained out of the silver. She sent me ten sestertia (80*l.*), and added that this was all which remained. You see what a person would do in a large concern, who could purloin this little from a small one. Philotimus has not only not arrived, but has not even acquainted me by letter, or by message, what he is doing. Some, who are come from Ephesus, relate that they saw him there going to law about some disputes of his own, which it is probable may be put off till Cæsar's arrival. So that I imagine he either has nothing which he thinks it of importance to deliver quickly to me (in which case I am the more neglected); or, if he has anything, he does not trouble himself to convey it to me till all his own business is finished. All this gives me great uneasiness; yet not so much, as perhaps it ought; for I apprehend nothing signifies less to me, than what is brought from thence^b. Why I think so^c, I am persuaded you know. When you caution me about accommodating my countenance and language to the time; difficult as this is, I would however command myself, if I thought it at all signified to me. When you say in your letter that you think the business of Africa may be settled^d, I wish you had added why you think so. No reason occurs to me to suppose that it can be done; but if there should be anything, which has a ray of consolation, I hope you will write to acquaint me with it: or if, as I perceive, there should be nothing, write to tell me even this. If I should soon hear anything, I will write to you. Farewell. August 6th.

LETTER XXIII.

(Græv. xx.)

On the 16th of August arrived C. Trebonius from Seleucea Pieria, after a voyage of twenty-seven days. He reported that he had seen Quintus, the son, and Hirtius, with Cæsar, at Antioch; and that they had obtained all that they asked on behalf of Quintus without any difficulty. At which I should the more rejoice, if this concession afforded me any assurance of hope. But there are other things to be feared, and from other quarters; and what is granted by Cæsar, as by a master, is still under his control. He has also pardoned Sallustius^e; and indeed is said to refuse nobody. Which itself is suspicious that inquiry may only be deferred. M. son to Quintus Gallius, has restored Sallustius' slaves. He came to transport the legions into Sicily; and brings word that Cæsar is preplaced in the hands of some trustee, who would not be exposed to the same ruin.

^a From Cæsar. See letter 20 of this book.

^b Because he thought himself equally doomed to suffer from the success of either party.

^c The war in Africa may be terminated by negotiation.

^d Perhaps the same, with whom Cicero had thought of sending his son. See letter 17 of this book.

sently going thither from Patre. If he does, I shall go to some place nearer Rome, as I wish I had done before. I am longing to receive your answer to the letter in which I lately requested your advice. Farewell. August 17.

LETTER XXIV.

(Græv. xxi.)

On the 27th of August I received your letter, dated the 21st; and the pain arising from Quintus's former misconduct, which I had now laid aside, I felt most severely upon reading his letter. Though you could not any how avoid sending me the letter, yet I would rather it had not been sent. In answer to what you say about the will, you must judge what can be done, and how. About the money, she^a wrote as I informed you before. If there is occasion, I must draw from the resource you mention. It is not probable that Cæsar will reach Athens by the 1st of September. Many things are said to detain him in Asia, especially Pharnaces^b. The 12th legion, to which Sulla came in the first instance, is reported to have driven him away by stones^c. They do not suppose that any of them will stir. It is expected that Cæsar will proceed directly from Patre to Sicily: but if this^d be true, he will be under the necessity of coming hither. And I wish he had come before: for I should then have got away somewhere or other. Now I am afraid of being obliged to wait, and among other things to bear in misery the unhealthiness of this place. What you advise of my taking care to act suitably to the time, I would do, if circumstances permitted, and if it were any how possible. But amidst such great offences on my part, and such great injuries on the part of my relations^e, I can neither do anything with becoming dignity, nor wear the appearance of it. You compare the times of Sulla: when everything was conducted splendidly in its kind, though a little intemperately in the manner. But I lay aside^f all considerations of this sort; and much rather prefer what may be advantageous to the community, with whose interest I have united my own. I should hope however that you will write to me as often as you can, particularly as nobody else writes: but if everybody

¹ It may seem at first contradictory, that Cicero should here speak of removing from Brundisium, when in the preceding letter he regrets his inability to do so. But probably his stay at Brundisium may have been thought proper, in order to salute Cæsar on his arrival; and this reason would cease when Cæsar should pass into Sicily and Africa without touching in Italy.

^a Terentia. See letter 23 of this book.

^b Pharnaces, the son of Mithridates, had unsuccessfully opposed Cæsar's forces in Asia Minor under Cn. Domitius Calvinus.

^c They refused to go into Africa till they should have received their pay. See letter 25 of this book.

^d This account of the troops refusing to march.

^e Alluding to Terentia, to Quintus, and to Dolabella, whose behaviour had very much vexed and mortified his too irritable mind.

^f Atticus had probably recommended the necessity of temporising, as in the times of Sulla; to which I understand Cicero to reply, that the cases are not similar; and that at all events his own views were directed to the public good, not to his private security. Literally thus—"But these things are of such a kind as I must forget."

wrote, yet I should be very anxious for your letters. You say that Cæsar will be more disposed to forgive Quintus at my intercession; but I before wrote you word, that he at once granted to Quintus the on everything he desired, without any mention of me*. Farewell.

LETTER XXV.

(Græv. xxii.)

BALBUS's messenger delivered the packet¹ to me very carefully. For² you write as if you were afraid I may not have received those letters, which I wish indeed had never been delivered to me: for they increased my affliction: and into whose ever hands they had fallen, they would have communicated nothing new. For what is so universally known, as his animosity against me, and this style of his letters? Which I imagine Cæsar transmitted to these persons, not because he was offended with Quintus's baseness, but for the sake of making my misfortunes more public. For when you say that you are afraid they may injure him³, and that you are endeavouring to remedy this, Cæsar did not even wait to be asked about him⁴. This I am not sorry for: I am more sorry that my own

* See Letter 23 of this book.

requests should have no effect. Sulla, as I conjecture, will be here to-morrow with Messala. They are hastening to Cæsar after being driven away by the soldiers, who refuse to go anywhere till they have received their pay. He⁷ will therefore come hither, which was not expected. But it will be some time first; for he travels so as to spend several days in the principal towns. And, do what he will, Pharnaces will occasion some delay. What therefore do you think I ought to do? For my health already supports with difficulty the effect of this unwholesome air, which occasions additional uneasiness in my distress. Shall I beg these people⁸, who are going to him, to make my excuses? And shall I proceed nearer to Rome? Pray consider this; and, what in spite of my repeated entreaties you have not hitherto done, assist me with your advice. I know it is a thing of difficulty; yet do it as may be in these troubles. It is besides of great consequence to me to see you: I shall have gained something, if that happens. You will attend to the business of the will, as you mention.

/ Cæsar.

* Sulla and Messala.

[A few days after Cicero had sent this last letter, Cæsar unexpectedly arrived in Italy. He landed at Tarentum in September, and on the first notice of his setting forwards towards Rome, Cicero set out on foot to meet him. Cæsar no sooner saw him, than he alighted and ran to embrace him; then walked with him alone, conversing familiarly with him for some time. Cicero followed Cæsar to Rome. At the end of the year Cæsar embarked for Africa, to pursue the war against Scipio and the other Pompeian generals.]

BOOK XII.

LETTER I.

It is now the eleventh day since we parted, and I scrawl these few lines, on the point of going from home before dawn. I design to get to-day to Anagninum, to-morrow to Tusculanum, and to spend there one day; so that on the 28th I shall observe our appointment. And I wish I may be able to run immediately afterwards to the embrace of my dear Tullia, and to get a kiss of Attica^a. Pray write to me all about her^b; that while I stay in Tusculanum, I may know what she prattles; or, if she is in the country, what she writes to you. In the meantime either send her, or give her, my love, and likewise to Pilia; and though we shall soon meet, yet write to me if you have anything to say.

While I was folding up this letter, the messenger, who had travelled all night, came to me with yours. Upon reading which, I have been much concerned at Attica's indisposition. I have learned from your letter everything else, which I expected. But as to what you say of the fire in the morning^c, it is a greater sign of age to waver

^b What relates to Attica.

^c It is reasonable to suppose this may refer to some expression of Atticus joking with Cicero for wanting a fire in the morning, like an old man; to which Cicero replies, in memory. For I had fixed the 29th with Axius, the 30th with you, and the day of my arrival with Quintus, that is the 28th. This is all I have to say to you: there is nothing new. What need of writing then? What? When we are together, and prattle about anything that comes into our heads, the very talking, even if it is about nothing, has a sweetness in the conversation itself.

LETTER II.

HERE, however^d, it is rumoured that Marcus has perished by shipwreck; that Asinius has been delivered up alive into the hands of the soldiers^e; that fifty ships have been carried into Utica by this adverse wind; that Pompeius^f is not to be found, nor has he been in the Balearic islands^g, as that it is a greater sign of age to lose one's memory, as Atticus appears to have done in making some mistake respecting the arrangement of the days after Cicero should have returned to Rome.

^d It is to be presumed that this refers to a previous letter received from Atticus, in which he might have said there was no news.

^e The Pompeians.

^f The son of Cn. Pompeius Magnus.

^g Majorca, Minorca, and Ivica.

Patenus affirms. But there is no authority for anything. I send you what has been talked of in your absence. In the meantime games are to be celebrated at Præneste: there will be Hirtius, and all that party¹; and the games are to last eight days. What feasting! What gaiety! While this is going on, the business¹ has perhaps been settled. O marvellous men! But Balbus is building: for what cares he? Yet, if you consider, for one who studies not what is right, but what is agreeable¹, has he not done well? "And are you asleep all this while? It is time you should explain your purpose, if you mean to do anything!" If you ask what I think, I think the proper purpose of life is, to be useful². But why should I say much? I shall presently see you; and, as I hope, from the road straight to me; when we will together appoint a day for Tyrannio³, and arrange anything else that is to be done.

LETTER III.

EXCEPTING myself, I believe nobody is less of a flatterer than I am; or if we are either of us occasionally so towards anybody, at least it is never towards each other. Listen to me, then, when I say this without any deceit: that I wish I may die, my Atticus, if not only my Tusculanum (where I am otherwise very happy), but the islands of the blessed spirits⁴ are so precious in my sight, that I could be content always to be there without you. Therefore, to attribute to you the same feeling (which, indeed, is the case), let these three days⁵ of which you speak be endured patiently; but I should be glad to know whether you come to-day immediately from the auction, or on what day. In the mean time, I occupy myself with my books, and am sorry that I have not got Vennonius's history. However, not to be silent about my affairs, there are three ways of recovering that debt which is granted⁶ me by Cæsar; either by purchasing at

² The business of the war in Africa.

³ To be given to sports at such a time.

⁴ Agreeably to the maxims of the Epicureans, which Atticus had adopted.

⁶ Conformably with what he says in his first book De Legibus, c. 20. "Quippe cum antiqui omnes, quod secundum naturam esset, quo iurarentur in vita, bonum esse decreverint." And De Fin. iv. 6, "Summum bonum est omnibus, aut maxime rebus illis, quæ secundum naturam sint, fruentem vivere."

⁷ To read together some work which Tyrannio had lately written. See letter 6 of this book.

⁸ Called also the Fortunate Islands, into which the spirits of good men were supposed to pass after death. They are believed to be the same as the Canaries. These were formerly only casually and imperfectly known, and had ascribed to them beauties which they never really possessed.

⁹ Hoc triduum probably refers to Atticus's own expression in some former letter, putting off his visit to Cicero for three days. It may be observed that Cicero was a very early riser, often writing his letters before it was light; he may very well, therefore, have sent to Atticus at Rome, only about twelve miles distant, to know if he might expect him that day.

¹⁰ It having been seen that at the approach of the war Cicero was indebted to Cæsar, it is not probable that he could subsequently have become his creditor. I am in-the sale (I would rather lose it: though independent of its baseness, I imagine this would itself be to lose it); or by assignment from a broker at a year's credit (who is there, that I could trust? Or when would that Metonic¹ year arrive?); or by Vectenus's agreement for one² half. Think about it. I am afraid, after all, that this man may make no sale; but that he may hasten to add his applause at the conclusion of the games, lest a person of such importance³ should be disregarded. But it⁴ shall be attended to.

LETTER IV.

YOUR letter was most acceptable and delightful to me. How say you? I have recovered my holiday⁵. For I was troubled at Tiro's account of your having appeared to him to be flushed. I shall add, therefore, one day more, as you propose. Respecting Cato, it is a problem fit for Archimedes⁶. It is impossible for me to write what your companions⁷ will read, not merely with satisfaction, but even with patience. For even if I should refrain from mentioning the opinions he has delivered, and all that zeal and wisdom which he showed on behalf of the republic; if I should drily attempt to commend his dignity and firmness; this itself may be worth hearing; but such a man cannot justly be praised, unless it is set forth that this state of things which is now established he saw while it was yet future, and strove to prevent; and that he might not see it accomplished, relinquished his life. Of these things what is there that I can render palatable to Aledius⁸? But pray take care of your health, and that prudence, which you show in everything, show especially in your own recovery.

LETTER V.

"QUINTUS the father for the fourth time¹," or rather for the thousandth time, shows his want of sense in taking pleasure at his son and Statius being inclined to think, therefore, that this debt to Cicero may have been due from one of Pompeius's party, whose goods were confiscated, but out of which Cæsar may have permitted Cicero to indemnify himself. See letter 21 of this book, note f.

² Alluding to the cycle of 19 years invented by Meto, in which time it was calculated (but not correctly) that the sun and moon would return to the same positions about the earth.

³ Being content to receive one-half of the debt, as it is probable Vectenus might have done on some similar occasion.

⁵ The recovery of his money.

⁶ Probably Cicero might have designed to go up to Rome on occasion of his friend's illness, but upon receiving a good account, determined to prolong his holidays another day.

⁷ It was a problem of exceeding difficulty to write his proposed panegyric upon Cato so as not to offend Cæsar.

⁸ Of Cæsar's party.

⁹ Some one studious of pleasing Cæsar. He is mentioned again, letters 23 and 24 of this book.

¹⁰ The original ispart of a verse of Ennius, quoted by Aul. Gell. x. 1, "Quintus pater quartum sit consul." made Lupercans*, to see his family loaded with this double disgrace. I may add also Philotimus as a third. What singular folly; if my own^b were not still greater. But what face can he have to ask you to defray his expenses for this purpose? Suppose him to have come to no "dry spring," but to Pirene^c itself; or, as you say, to drink in your fountain "the emerging flood of Alpheus^d;" especially under his great embarrassments. Where can this end? But it is his affair. I am much pleased with my "Cato:" but so was Bassus Lucilius^e with his performances. About Cælius^f you will inquire, as you mention; I am quite ignorant. Not only his ability, but his character should be known. You will let me know if you have any doubts about Hortensius and Virginius; though, as far as I see, you will not easily find anything more desirable. You will negotiate with Mustella, as you mention, when Crispus arrives. I wrote to Aulus, to tell him that I had explained to Piso what I knew for certain about the gold. For I agree with you that this business is protracted too long, and that everything should now be got together from all parts. I plainly perceive that your whole time and attention is taken up with my concerns; and that your desire of coming to me is prevented by my business. But I consider you as actually with me, not only because you are conducting my affairs, but also because I seem to see how you conduct them. For no hour of your occupation passes without my knowledge. I find that Tubulus^g was prætor in the consulship of L. Metellus and Q. Maximus. Now I wish to know under what consuls P. Scævola, the Pontifex Maximus, was tribune of the people. I imagine it was under the next, Cæpio and Pompeius; for he was prætor under P. Furius and Sex. Atilius. You will give me, therefore, the date of his tribunate; and, if you can, let me know with what crime Tubulus was charged. Pray see, too, whether L. Libo (he who accused Ser. Galba) was tribune of the people in the consulship of Censorinus and Manilius, or in that of T. Quintus and Manius Acilius. For I am perplexed by the Fannian

* The Lupercans were those who conducted the festivities of the Lupercalia, instituted in honour of Pan, on which occasion they ran about the streets almost naked. There were formerly two companies of Lupercans, to whom Cæsar had lately added a third, into which people were desirous of being admitted; but Cicero thought this flattery unbecoming his family. Statius was a freed-man of Quintus's.

^b By his own folly he probably means the part he had acted in the civil war, with which he always appears to be dissatisfied.

^c An abundant spring near Corinth, sacred to the Muses.

^d The original is taken from Pindar, who thus characterises the fountain Arethuse, feigned to be derived from the river Alpheus in the Peloponnesus, passing under the sea and rising up in Sicily. Cicero means to say that it was absurd for his brother, who was considerably embarrassed in his fortune, to incur such an expense, and to rely upon Atticus's resources.

^e Some obscure author, whose works pleased nobody but himself.

^f This part of the letter seems to allude to Cicero's negotiations with different bankers, or brokers, about the sale of his plate, which he wished to exchange for gold, either to be secreted or taken with him, in case of insurrection, or counter-revolution.

^g This and what follows probably alludes to Cicero's treatise "De Finibus," on which he was then engaged, and doubtful of some circumstances and dates mentioned in the second book.

epitome of Brutus, or rather Brutus's epitome of Fannius's history. I wrote what I found in the latter part of that work; in following which I called this Fannius, who wrote the history, son-in-law to Lælius: but you demonstratively refuted it. Now Brutus and Fannius refute you. I had understood from Hortensius, who is good authority, that it was as Brutus states. Disentangle, therefore, this matter. I have sent Tiro to meet Dolabella. He will return to me the thirteenth; and I shall hope to see you the next day. I perceive the great interest you take in my dear Tullia; and that this may always be the case I earnestly entreat you. So, then, all is still open to consideration^h; for so you write word. Though I wished to avoid the beginning of the monthⁱ, and to escape the ledger of the Nicasios^j, and I have my own accounts to make up; yet nothing is of sufficient moment to make me absent myself from you; being actually at Rome, and hoping very soon to see you; though every day the hours seem long whilst I am expecting you. You know that I am no flatterer, and say, therefore, something less than I feel.

LETTER VI.

WITH respect to Cælius, pray take care that there is no defect in the gold. I know the way of these things^k. But the loss from the exchange is quite enough; and if to this is added the gold itself—But what am I saying? You will see after it. Here you have something in Hegesius's style^l, which Varro commends. I come now to Tyrannio^m. What say you? Is this true? and without me? How often have I, when I was at leisure, yet refrained from reading it without you? How, therefore, can you excuse this? There is but one way; by sending me the book, which I particularly beg you to do; though the book itself will not delight me more than I have been delighted with your admiration of it. For I love everybody that shows his attachment to his countrymenⁿ; and am pleased with your great admiration of so subtle a speculation. Though indeed your observations are all of that kind^o; for you are fond of that science by which alone the understanding is nourished. But pray, what is there in that acute and deep research, which has reference to the ultimate principle^p of ⁱ This is supposed to be owing to his unwillingness to appear in the senate convened by order of Cæsar on the first of August.

^j The meaning of this is uncertain, but most probably relates to the payment of interest to some usurers of this name, if he should be obliged to borrow money.

^k I understand this to mean, I know how liable gold is to be adulterated.

^l Some author, whose manner of writing bore some resemblance to the preceding sentence, perhaps the interruption and interrogation.

^m See letter 2 of this book.

ⁿ Atticus, though not properly an Athenian, is elsewhere considered as such:—"ita enim æ Athenis collocauit. ut sit pæne unus ex Atticis." [De Fin. v. 2.] as indeed his name implies. Cicero's meaning in this place is, that Atticus, by his approbation of Tyrannio's subtlety in reasoning, shows his attachment to the taste of his countrymen the Athenians.

^o Distinguished by niceness of judgment and acuteness, by which the mind is exercised.

morals? However, this is a long inquiry; and you are engaged, perhaps, in some business of mine; and instead of that dry basking¹ which you overdid on my lawn, I shall expect to be entertained with ointments and elegances. But, to go back to my former subject: if you love me, send the book; for it is truly yours since it has been sent to you. "Have you so much leisure from your affairs, Chremes," that you can read also my "Orator?" Well done! I am much obliged; and shall be still more so, if not only in your own copy, but in those for other people, you will get your librarians to insert Aristophanes in the place of Eupolis². Caesar, I imagine, meant to rally you upon using the word quasso, which, however, is quaint and pleasing. At the same time he so insists upon your being under no anxiety, that I can have no doubt of his intention³. I am sorry that Attica's indisposition⁴ should continue so long; but as she has now no shivering, I hope all is going on as we could wish.

LETTER VII.

I HAVE made a short note of everything that you desire, and have delivered it to Eros; indeed, more than you ask; and amongst other things what relates to my son, the first notice of whose wish I received from you. I talked freely with him: and, if it is convenient to you, should be glad if you would inquire about it from himself. But why should I delay to inform you? I explained to him that by my desire you had applied to him to know whether there was anything that he wished or wanted; and that you had acquainted me with his wish of going to Spain⁵, and his want of a liberal allowance. With respect to his allowance, I told him I would do as much as Publius, or the flamen Lentulus, had done for their sons. Respecting Spain, I mentioned two objections; one, the same that occurred to you, that I was fearful of incurring reproach. Was it not enough to have relinquished our arms in support of the Pompeian party? Must we also take arms against it? The other objection was, that he would be mortified by seeing his cousin admitted to greater familiarity and favour. I would rather he should enjoy my liberality than his own liberty. Yet I gave my consent: for I understood that you did not greatly object to it. I must think about it again and again, and I beg you to do the same. It is a great thing, and one that involves no difficulty to remain quiet: the other is very doubtful. But we will consider of ¹ This probably alludes to some conversation on the foundation of moral duty, held at Cicero's house during the time of their basking in the sun, as was usual among the ancient Romans. The word abassus seems to imply that Atticus had carried this to a prejudicial extent: the ointments and elegances mentioned are intended to designate Atticus's politeness compared with Cicero's drier statement; ointments being often used previous to basking.

³ Cicero, in his piece entitled "Orator," had, it seems, erroneously put Eupolis for Aristophanes.

⁴ Atticus had applied to Caesar to spare the estates of the people about Buthrotum, which were threatened with confiscation for their attachment to Pompeius.

⁶ To join Caesar's army against Pompeius' sons.

it. About Balbus I had made a memorandum, and think of doing so, as you advise, as soon as he comes back. But if his coming is delayed, I shall at all events wait three days. I omitted to mention also that Dolabella is with me.

LETTER VIII.

MANY persons approve of this measure respecting Cicero¹. He² is a very proper companion. But we must previously see about this first payment³, for the day approaches, and he⁴ travels quickly. Pray write to inform me what news Celer brings of Caesar's transactions with the candidates; whether he intends to go himself into the Campus Fœnicularius, or into the Campus Martius. And I should like to know whether it is necessary to be at Rome at the comitia; for I must needs satisfy both Filia⁵, and especially Attica.

LETTER IX.

(Græc. x.)

THIS is sad indeed about Athamas⁶. Your concern is natural, but ought to be moderated. There are many ways of consolation; of which the properest is, to let reason do that which time will do. But let us take care of Alexis⁷, that counterpart of Tiro, whom I have sent back sick to Rome; and if there is any epidemical sickness on the Quirinal hill⁸, let us transfer him with Tisamenus⁹ to my house. All the upper part of the house is unoccupied, as you know. I think this is worth considering.

LETTER X.

(Græc. xi.)

I AM sorry for poor Sejus: but whatever happens in the course of nature must be borne with patience. For indeed what are we? Or how long are we likely to regard these things? Let us consider ¹ Cicero the son. It probably relates to his going to Athens to complete his studies, instead of joining Caesar's army, which seems to have been returning from Spain.

² It appears elsewhere that the son was accompanied to Athens by L. Montanus, who is probably therefore the person here intended. See letter 53 of this book.

³ It is uncertain to what this alludes.

⁴ It is probable that this may mean Caesar, on his return from the Spanish war.

⁵ This may perhaps mean, whether Caesar will appoint the magistrates "in a field of fennel," that is, in Spain, or suffer them to be regularly elected in the "field of Mars," or Campus Martius at Rome; for both Plinius and Dioscorides take notice of fennel (μυρραδωρ, feniculum) being particularly cultivated in Spain; and Strabo mentions a place in Spain called "the fennel plain," from this circumstance.

⁸ Another slave, and amanuensis.

⁹ The district of Rome where Atticus lived.

¹⁰ A third slave of Atticus, who might wait upon Alexis or who might himself be ill.

what more nearly concerns ourselves, (yet not much either), what I should do about the senate. Not to omit anything, Cæsonius has written to me to say that Posthumia, Sulpicius's wife, is come to his house. I have already told you that I have no thoughts at present of Pompeius Magnus's daughter¹. The other whom you mention, I believe you know. I never saw anything more disgusting. But I shall presently see you: therefore when we meet. After I had sealed my letter, I received yours. I hear with pleasure of Attica's cheerfulness, yet partake of your anxiety.

LETTER XI.

(Græc. ix.)

I ASSURE you I am very well pleased with being here¹, and that, more and more every day, but for the reason² which I mentioned in a former letter. Nothing can be pleasanter than this retreat, if it were not a little interrupted by the son of Amyntas³. What a tiresome loquacity! In other respects, you can imagine nothing more delightful than the house, the coast, the view of the sea, and, in short, the whole together. But even this does not require a long letter, and I have nothing particular to tell you, and am very sleepy.

LETTER XII.

ON the subject of the dower¹ I want you so much the more to clear me from all imputation. Balbus's delegation of his authority is quite royal². Make an end by any means. It is discreditable for the business to lie in this state of suspense. The isle of Arpinas³ may be very proper for the dedication⁴, but I fear it will not be thought to confer the same degree of honour⁵. It lies out of ¹ To avoid either offending Cæsar or acting in a manner unbecoming his former character and connexions.

² Previous to this time Cicero had divorced his wife Terentia, and was thinking of marrying again, which he soon after did.

³ Probably at Astura. See letters 19 and 40 of this book. To this place Cicero retired after the death of his daughter, who died in childbirth.

⁴ Perhaps the absence of Atticus. See letter 16 of this book, which may not improbably be the letter alluded to; the order of these short letters (many of them little more than notes, and without a date) having been apparently deranged in many instances. It would be a laborious and fruitless task to endeavour to rectify it.

¹ It seems to me most probable that this may relate to the repayment of Terentia's dower upon her divorce.

² It is quite uncertain to what this alludes; most probably to some debt due from Cicero, the care of which Balbus had delegated to some third person. It may be that the discharge of this prevented the immediate payment of the dower.

³ Arpinas was a place inland, but surrounded by a division and re-union of the river Fibrenus before it falls into the Liris.—De Legibus, li. 3.

⁴ This must allude to his design of deifying his daughter Tullia, who had lately died, though nothing has yet been said of that event. It is probable that the letter may have been misplaced. See letter 18 of this book.

⁵ Arpinas, though in many respects very proper for the erection of a temple consecrated to his daughter, yet lay the way. My wish therefore is for the gardens¹; which I will, however, examine on my arrival. About Epicurus² it shall be as you please; though I incline to this latter kind of persons³. It is incredible how eagerly some people desire the other. To the ancients therefore; for this is free from invidiousness⁴. I have nothing to tell you: but I have determined, nevertheless, to write every day for the sake of eliciting your answers; not that I expect anything from them, but yet I somehow do expect. Therefore, whether you have anything to say or nothing, yet write something; and take care of yourself.

LETTER XIII.

I AM not easy about Attica, though I rely upon Craterus's¹ opinion. Brutus's letter is sensible and friendly², but made me shed many tears. This retreat³ is less worrying to me than that concourse of people. I want nobody but you. However, I occupy myself in study with the same ease as if I was at home⁴. Yet the same violence of grief presses and hangs upon me; not that I indulge it, but still I do not resist it. Respecting what you mention of Appuleius⁵, I apprehend there is no occasion for any exertion on your part, or on that of Balbus and Oppius, to whom he pledged himself, and desired I might be informed that he would not give me any trouble. Nevertheless, get me excused from day to day on account of my health. Lænas had promised to do this. Engage⁶ C. Septimius and L. Statilius. In short, nobody that you ask will refuse to swear. But if there is any difficulty, I will go up myself, and will swear to a continual sickness. For as I must absent myself from these meetings, I would rather it should appear to be done by law than by grief. I should be glad if you would call upon Cocceius; for he does not perform what he promised. I wish to buy some place to hide and shelter my affliction.

too much out of common observation to do her the honour he desired.

² Cicero has been shown before to be at this time engaged in his book "De Finibus," in which he discusses in a dialogue the opinions of different philosophers respecting the constitution of moral virtue, and seems to have consulted Atticus upon the person whom he should introduce to support Epicurus's doctrine.

³ By "this latter kind" I conceive to be meant not "more recent," but on the contrary, those who had been some time dead, but whom he had eventually named last among different descriptions of persons.

⁵ Craterus was a physician of eminence at Rome.

⁷ At Astura, near Antium.

⁸ Among his books, in his usual residence at Rome. See letter 42 of this book.

¹⁰ It seems to have been necessary for three of the college to attest the incapacity of one from attending; he therefore desires Atticus to apply to C. Septimius and L. Statilius, in addition to Lænas. See letter 14 of this book.

LETTER XIV.

I WROTE to you yesterday about excusing me to Appuleius. I imagine there is no difficulty. Whomsoever you call upon, nobody will refuse. But speak to Septimius, and Lænas, and Statilius; for there must be three. Lænas promised me to manage the whole. As to what you mention of being called upon by Junius^a; assuredly Cornificius is a rich man: however, I should like to know when it is that I am said to have been bound; and whether for the father or for the son. Nevertheless, as you say, see Cornificius's agents, and the surveyor^b Appuleius. In wishing me to be restored from my affliction, you act as you always do; but you are witness that I have not been wanting to myself. For there is nothing written by anybody on the lessening of affliction, which I have not read at your house. But my grief overcomes all consolation. I have even done what nobody ever did before me, written for my own consolation. I will send the book to you, if the clerks have transcribed it. I assure you, no comfort is equal to it. I write all day long; not that I expect any good from it, but for the time I am pre-occupied; not effectually indeed, for the violence of my grief presses me; but yet I am soothed; and I strive by all means to compose my mind only, but, if possible, my very countenance. In doing which I sometimes think I am doing wrong, sometimes I think I should do wrong if I omitted it. There is some relief in retirement: but it would be much better if you were here. This is the only reason of my removal. For, in regard to my distress, it suits well. Yet this also is a source of regret; that you can no longer entertain the same regard for me; those qualifications in which you used to take pleasure are gone. I wrote to you before about Brutus's letter to me. It was sensibly written, but afforded me no comfort. What he wrote to you of his coming hither; that I should like; for such appears to be his affection that it could not fail of doing me some good. If you have any intelligence, I hope you will write to me, especially to inform me when Pansa^c sets out. I am concerned about Attica, yet I rely upon Craterus. Do not let Pilia despond. Your own accustomed anxiety is enough for everybody.

LETTER XV.

As it is not thought right to make a general excuse to Appuleius, you will take care that it is renewed from day to day. In this solitude I have no intercourse with anybody; but penetrate in the morning into a thick rough wood, from whence I do not go out before evening. Next to you, nothing is more pleasing to me than solitude. There all my conversation is with books. Even this is interrupted by tears, which I resist as much as I can; but hitherto I am unequal to it. I will write an answer to Brutus, as you advise. You shall have the letter to-morrow, and will forward it when you have an opportunity.

^a This Junius seems to have called upon Atticus, as Cicero's friend, about some money due from Cornificius, for whom Cicero had been surety.

^b This is evidently a different person from that Appuleius mentioned in the beginning of the letter.

^c He had been appointed to succeed Brutus in the government of Cisalpine Gaul.

LETTER XVI.

I WOULD not have you neglect your own concerns to come to me. I will rather go to some place nearer, if you should be prevented much longer. Though, indeed, I should not have removed out of your sight, unless I had found that nothing was of any use to me; yet if there was any alleviation, it was only in you; and as soon as there can be from anything, it will be from you. Now, however, I cannot bear the very circumstances of being without you: but I do not approve of staying in your house; nor can I stay in my own; nor if I were anywhere near, should I still be with you; for the same cause would prevent your being with me, which prevents you now. As yet nothing has been more agreeable to me than this solitude, which I wish Philippus may not destroy^d, for he arrived yesterday evening. Writing and study do not assuage my grief, but they interrupt it.

LETTER XVII.

MARCIANUS has informed me that my excuse has been made to Appuleius by Laterensis, Naso, Lænas, Torquatus, and Strabo. I should be glad if you would get letters written to them expressive of my thankfulness. As to what Flavius says of my having been surety for Cornificius more than five-and-twenty years ago, though the defaulter is rich, and Appuleius is a liberal appraiser, yet I should be glad if you would find out from the books of the joint securities, whether it is really so. For previously to my being exile I had no intercourse with Cornificius. I do not, however, mean to deny it; but I should like to know the truth. You may also call upon the agents, if you think proper. Though what does it signify to me? Nevertheless—You will inform me of Pansa's departure when you know it. Give my love to Attica, and pray take good care of her. My respects to Pilia.

LETTER XVIII.

WHILE I avoid all recollections which by a certain sting exasperate my pain, I refrain from advising with you; but trust you will excuse me in this matter, whether I am doing right or wrong. For some of those authors, which I now chiefly read, say, that it is a duty to do what I have frequently mentioned to you, and what I would fain have you approve. I speak of the temple^e; which I request you to consider in proportion to the affection you bear me. I have no hesitation about the kind of building, being satisfied with Cluavius's design; nor about the thing itself, which is deter-malred; but I sometimes doubt about the situation. I wish therefore that you would think about it. Yes, I will consecrate her, as much as can be done in these learned times, with monuments of every kind, drawn from the best sense of all writers, both Greek and Latin. This may perhaps renew my wound; but I consider myself bound, as it were, by a vow and promise; and that long space of time, when I shall cease to be, influences me more than this short period, which, however, seems to me too long. For, after trying everything, I find nothing in which I can acquiesce. While I was engaged in that treatise about which I wrote to you before, I was, as it were, cherishing my sufferings. Now I reject everything, and find nothing better than solitude; which Philippos has not interrupted, as I apprehended. For after paying his compliments to me yesterday, he immediately set off for Rome. I have sent you the letter which I wrote to Brutus at your recommendation. You will take care to have it transmitted along with yours. I have, however, sent a copy of it to you, that, if you do not approve of it, you may not send it. When you say that my domestic concerns are regularly administered, I should like to know what you allude to. There are some things about which I am solicitous. See that Cocceius does not fail me. For what Libo promises, as Eros writes me word, I consider as certain. Respecting my principal, I trust to Sulpicius and to Egnatius. Why should you trouble yourself about Appuleius, when the excuse is so easy? Consider how difficult it is for you to come to me, as you propose. For it is a long journey; and I cannot take leave of you without great pain at your departure, which it may perhaps be necessary for you to make speedily. But all as you please. For whatever you do I shall think to be done for the best, and done for my sake. Having learned yesterday from other letters the circumstance of Antonius's approach, I was surprised there should be nothing said about it in yours. But it may possibly have been written the day before it was sent. Not that I care about such matters. But I suppose he is come up about his sureties. As to what you mention of Terentia's speaking about the witnesses to my will, in the first place, be assured that I care nothing about it, nor have I room to admit any trifling or new concern¹. But what resemblance is there between the two cases? She would not employ those who she thought would inquire, unless they knew what it contained. Was there any danger of that in my case? However, let her do as I do. I will give my will to be read by whom she pleases: he will find that I could not have behaved more honourably towards my grandchild than I have done. For as to not calling upon her to attest it; in the first place, it never entered into my mind; next, it did not for that reason, because it was of no consequence. Yourself know (if only you recollect) that I desired you at the time to bring some of your people. For what need was there of many? Indeed I meant your attendants: upon which you suggested that I should send to Silius:

² So filled was he with concern for his daughter, that he perhaps for the republic.

whence it arose that I sent to Publius¹: but neither was necessary. You will manage this as you think best.

LETTER XIX.

THIS place¹ is indeed pleasant, and open to the sea, and capable of being seen both from Antium and from Circei; but we must consider how, amongst all the change of possessors, who may be innumerable in an endless posterity (if only this state of things should last), that which is consecrated may still subsist. I have now no need of revenue, and can be content with a little. I sometimes think of getting some of the gardens on the other side of the Tiber; for this reason, that I know nothing which would be so much frequented. Which of them it should be, we will consider when we meet; but the temple must be finished this summer. At all events settle with Apella, the Chian, about the pillars. I approve of what you mentioned about Cocceius and Libo; and especially about my judgship². Respecting the bond³, you will let me hear when you have discovered anything; yet I should like to know what Cornificius's agents say, but would not have you give yourself much trouble about it while you are so engaged. Respecting Antonius, Balbus also wrote to me in a joint letter with Oppius, and with your concurrence, that I need not be disturbed. I returned my thanks to them: but, as I have before told you, I would have you understand that I neither was disturbed at that news, nor shall I now be disturbed at anything. If Panæa has set out to-day, as you supposed, henceforward begin to inform me what you expect about Brutus's arrival; that is, on what day. If you know where he now is, you will easily be able to form a conjecture. Concerning what you mention to Tiro about Terentia, I entreat you, my Atticus, to undertake the whole business. You perceive that some duty on my part is implicated, upon which you are fully informed; and some suppose young Cicero's fortune to be concerned. The former consideration weighs far the most with me, as being more sacred and important; especially as I conceive this latter to be neither well founded nor settled.

LETTER XX.

YOU seem not yet entirely to understand how indifferent I am about the arrival of Antonius, and about everything of the kind. On the subject of Terentia I wrote to you in the letter I sent yesterday. When you exhort me, and say that others expected it of me likewise, that I should dissemble the excess of my affliction; can I do more than spend whole days in study? Though I do it, not for the sake of dissembling, but rather of soothing and healing my mind; and if I do not reap adequate advantage, surely I do enough for appearance. I write the less to you, because I am expecting your reply to my letter of yesterday. I am expecting particularly to hear about the temple; and something also about Terentia. I wish you would inform me in your next letter, whether Cn. Cæpio, the father of that Servilia who married Claudius, perished by shipwreck in the lifetime of his father, or after his death; likewise whether Rutilia died before, or after her son C. Cotta. They relate to the book I have been writing on the moderation of grief.

³ It is uncertain to what this alludes; perhaps some occasion of Cicero's acting as a judge, from which Atticus may have got him excused.

LETTER XXI.

I HAVE read Brutus's letter^a, and return it to you. To say the truth, it is not a very civil answer to your questions. But this is his affair. Though one thing shows a shameful ignorance, for he supposes that Cato was the first to propose the sentence of death on the Catilinarian conspirators; whereas everybody had proposed it before except Cæsar. And because the sentence of Cæsar himself, then speaking in the place of prætor, was so severe, he supposes those of the consular senators to have been more lenient; that is, of Catulus, Servilius, the Luculli, Curio, Torquatus, Lepidus, Gellius, Volcatius, Figulus, Cotta, L. Cæsar, C. Piso, and M. Glabrio, with Silanus and Murena, the consuls elect. Why then was the decree made according to the opinion of Cato? Because he had said the same thing in more brilliant and copious terms. Me he commends for having brought the affair before the senate, not for having discovered it; for giving encouragement, and for having formed my judgment before I consulted them. It was because Cato had extolled all this to the skies, and had proposed its being entered in the decree, that the vote was carried in favour of his opinion. Brutus seems to think he has done much for me by calling me the excellent consul. What enemy ever spoke in more meagre terms? And how does he reply to your other observations? He only desires you to set him right about the decree of the senate. He would have done as much if he had been told of it by Ranius. But this again is his own affair. Respecting the gardens^b, since you approve of it, get something done. You know the state of my affairs. If, besides, anything is received from Faberius, there is no difficulty. But, even without that, I think I am able to manage it. Those of Drusus are certainly to be sold; possibly also those of Lamia and Cassius: but of this when we meet. I cannot write more properly about Terentia than you do. Let my duty be the first thing to be considered. If anything should go amiss, I would rather the fault should lie with her than with myself. A hundred sestertia (800*l.*) must be procured for Orbia, the wife of C. Lollius. Eros says he cannot do it without me; I suppose, because some valuation^c is to be accepted and assigned. I wish he had mentioned it to you. For if the business, as he tells me, is ready, and he does not deceive me in this, it might be completed through you. I should be glad if you would inquire into this and settle it. When you call upon me to attend the business of the forum, you call upon me to do that which, even in happier circumstances, I avoided. For what have I to do with the forum, without legal trials, without a senate, and meeting those whom I cannot look upon with patience? As to what you say of people's requiring of me that I should be at Rome, and not suffering me to absent myself, or suffering it only to a certain extent; know that I have long since esteemed you more than all those together; and that I have some regard for myself too, and would much sooner abide by my own judgment than that of all the rest. Yet I do not go further^d than the wisest men allow; all of whose writings, so far as they relate to that subject, I have not only read, which is itself a mark of some courage for a sick man to admit of his remedy, but have even transferred into my own compositions, which is certainly no sign of a dejected and broken spirit. From such remedies do not endeavour to recall me into that throng, lest I relapse.

LETTER XXII.

IN throwing upon me all the burden of Terentia's business^e, you do not act with your usual indulgence towards me,—for these wounds are such as I cannot touch without the greatest pain. Manage it therefore, I beseech you, as you can. For I ask nothing more of you, than you can accomplish; and you alone can find out what the truth is about Rutilia^f. As you seem to doubt, you will write to me when you know, and as soon as you can; also whether Clodia was living after the death of the consular D. Brutus, her son. This may be ascertained from Marcellus, or at least from Posthumia; the other from M. Cotta, or Scyrus, or Satyrus. I entreat you again and again on the subject of the gardens. I must strive with all my own means and those of my friends, who I am persuaded will not desert me; but I shall be able to do it by myself. And I have some property also, which I can easily sell. But without selling, by mortgaging the land for one year to the vendor, I can obtain what I want if you assist me. Those of Drusus are quite ready, for he is wanting to dispose of them. The next I think are Lamia's^g; but he is absent. However, if you can, find out something about them. Silius also makes no use of his, and will easily be satisfied with that interest. You have^h your instructions. Consider, not what the present state of my affairs requires, which I regard not, but what is the object of my wishes, and what is the occasion of them?

^a Brutus might probably have drawn up some account of Cato, which he had submitted to Atticus, and upon which Atticus had made observations, and proposed certain questions.

^g Notwithstanding my objections to admit conjectural emendations of the text, I have supposed this ought to be Aabe, which is quite agreeable to Cicero's manner of writing, while the common reading of Aabe is both harsh and scarcely intelligible. See book vi. letter 1, and book xiv. letter 2, also book xvi. letters 7 and 16.

LETTER XXIII.

By the beginning of your letter I thought you were going to send me some news; for you say, that although I did not care about what was doing in Spain, yet you would write. But in truth you only replied to my letter¹, as regarded the forum, and the senate. But my house is, you say, the forum². What is my house itself to me without the forum? All is over, all is over, Atticus; I have long seen it, but now I acknowledge it, since I have lost the only tie³ by which I was held. Therefore I seek retirement. And yet if anything should bring me thither, I will endeavour if possible (and it will be possible) to let nobody besides myself be sensible of my affliction; not even you, if by any means this be practicable. And in truth this is the reason of my not going up. You remember what Aledius⁴ asked of you. Even now they⁵ tease me: what would be the case if I should go thither? Attend to the affair of Terentia as you mention, and save me from this great addition to my great calamities. That you may know I am not so overwhelmed with grief, as to be quite sunk, your annals mention the year in which Carneades with the other deputies arrived in Rome; now I want to know, what was the occasion of it; I imagine it was on the business of Oropus⁶, but am not certain; and if it is so, what debates were held about it; besides, what distinguished Epicurean there was at that time, who presided in the gardens⁷; and what illustrious statesmen were then at Athens⁸; which I apprehend you can find out from Apollodorus's book. I am sorry about Attica; yet as her illness is slight, I trust that all is going well. I had no doubt about Gamala⁹; for whence should his father Ligus be so fortunate? Not to speak of myself, who am incapable of relief, though everything should happen as I wish. I heard the same valuation of Drusus's gardens which you mention, and I believe I stated it in my letter to you yesterday. But whatever be the price, that is well bought which must needs be had. To me, whatever you may think (for I know what I think myself), it is some discharge, if not of my grief, at least of my bounden¹⁰ duty. I have written to Sica in consequence of his acquaintance with L. Cotta. If nothing should be settled about these gardens across the Tiber, Cotta has some property near Ostia in a very public part, though it is but a little place. For this purpose, however, it is abundantly sufficient. I wish you would think of this; but do not be alarmed at the price of the gardens. I have now no want of plate or of clothes⁴, or of any places of pleasure: this is what I want. I see too from whom⁵ I can get assistance. But speak with Silius; for there is nothing better. I have also given instructions to Sica, who sends me word that he has made some appointment with him. Let him therefore write to inform me what he has done; and let it be⁶ as you shall think proper.

LETTER XXIV.

I AM glad that A. Silius has settled his business; for I did not care to refuse him, yet doubted how far it was in my power to serve him. Make an end of Ovia's affair, as you propose. It seems now to be time to make some arrangement about Cicero¹. But I wish to know whether the money that he will want at Athens, can be obtained by letters of exchange, or must be carried with him; and should be glad if you would take the whole affair into consideration, respecting both the manner and time. You will be able to learn from Aledius whether Publius is going into Africa, and when. I wish you would inquire, and let me know. And, to return to my own trifles, I want you to inform me whether P. Crassus, the son of Venuleia, died in the lifetime of his father the consular, P. Crassus, as I think he did, or afterwards. Likewise, if my memory is correct about Regillus, the son of Lepidus, that he died before his father. You will despatch these affairs of Cispus, and of Præcius. All seems to go on most favourably with Attica. Make my compliments to her and to Pilia.

LETTER XXV.

SICA has written to me all the particulars about Silius, and mentioned his having laid the circumstances before you, as you also acknowledge. I am pleased with the thing itself, and with the terms; but should prefer paying in money, rather than by a valuation¹; for Silius will not want an estate for pleasure. But though I can be content with my present income, I can scarcely do with less. Whence then am I to find the money? You will get six hundred sestertia (4800*l.*) from Hermogenes, especially as it is a case of necessity: and I find that I have as much in the house. For the rest I can pay interest to Silius, till I discharge it by means of Faberius, or somebody who is indebted to him. There will be something also from other quarters. But you will manage the whole business for me. In truth I greatly prefer these gardens to those of Drusus; nor are they to be compared together. Believe me, I am influenced but by one motive, upon which I know that I am wild. Yet humour this my folly, as you do. For as to what you say of the "repose of old age¹," that consideration is at an end; I am in pursuit of other things.

LETTER XXVI.

SICA writes me word, that even if he should not come to any agreement with A. Silius, yet he will come here on the 23d. I readily forgive your occupations, with which I am well acquainted; and doubt not of your disposition, or rather your wish and earnest desire, that we may be together. With respect to Nicias, if I were in a state to enjoy his kindness, I should be particularly glad to have him with me; but to me solitude and retirement is a province¹. Because Sica was contented to bear this, I am the more desirous of seeing him. Besides, you know the weakness and delicacy of our friend Nicias, and his habits in regard to food. Why then should I be a trouble to him, while he can be no pleasure to me? Nevertheless, his goodwill is gratifying to me. One subject² you mention to me, upon which I am resolved to say nothing in return; for I hope I have prevailed with you to save me from that trouble. My compliments to Pilia and to Attica.

LETTER XXVII.

RESPECTING the Silian affair, though the conditions are not unknown to me, yet I expect to hear all about it to-day from Sica. Cotta's villa, which you say you do not know, is beyond Silius's, with which I think you are acquainted; it is a poor place, and very small. It has no land about it; no space for any other purpose, though enough for what I want. I look for notoriety. But if we come to an agreement about Silius's gardens, that is, if you agree (for it rests entirely with you) we need think no more about Cotta. With regard to Cicero, I will do as you mention, and shall leave it to him to fix the time. You will get exchanged what money is necessary. If you find out anything from Aledius you will, as you mention, write me word. I perceive from your letters, as you must also from mine, that we have nothing new to say. The same subjects recur every day, and are long since worn out: yet can I not refrain from writing daily, that I may hear from you in return. Upon the subject of Brutus, however, you may have some intelligence; for I imagine you know by this time where he means to wait for Pansa. If, as is usual, in the nearest part of the province, he will be likely to arrive about the beginning of next month. I should be glad if it were later; as I have many reasons for avoiding Rome; so that I even doubt if I should not offer him some excuse, which I see would be very easy. But there is time enough to think of it. My compliments to Pilia and Attica.

LETTER XXVIII.

I HAVE learned no more about Silius from my own conversation with Sica, than from his letter: for he wrote very accurately. If therefore anything occurs to you in the communication you may have with him, you will let me know it. Upon the subject¹, about which you suppose some notice has been sent to me, whether it has been sent or not, I cannot tell; certainly nothing has reached me. Do you therefore proceed as you have begun; and if you can so settle it (which, to say the truth I do not expect) as to get her² approbation, you may if you please make use of Cicero. It may be of some consequence to him³, that he should appear to have wished it for her sake: to me it signifies nothing, excepting so far as you know⁴, which I greatly regard. When you recall me to my usual habits, I must say that I have long since mourned for the republic, though I did it more gently; for I had something on which my mind could repose. Now I am quite incapable of maintaining the same intercourse and way of life. Nor in this do I think that I need trouble myself with the opinions of other people: my own inward sense is of more weight with me than the talk of the world. While I have been consoling myself in study, I have no reason to be dissatisfied with the advantage I have gained. I have lessened my repining; my sorrow I neither could, nor, if I could, should I wish it. You rightly interpret my wishes respecting Triarius. But do nothing without their approbation. I love him even in his death; I am the guardian of his children, and bear affection towards the whole family. With regard to the Castrician business, if Castricius wishes to receive a price for his slaves, and will consent to its being paid in the manner that payments are now made⁵, certainly nothing is more convenient. But if he is determined to take away the slaves themselves, it does not appear to me to be equitable; since you desire me to tell you what I think. I should be sorry that my brother Quintus should have any trouble about it. And I think I understand that you are of the same opinion⁶. If Publius waits for the equinox, as you say Aledius told you, I suppose he will soon sail⁷. He told me he should go by way of Sicily. Whether he does go, and when, I should like to know. And I wish, at some time when it is convenient to you, that you would visit the little Lentulus⁸, and send him such of my slaves as you think proper. Compliments to Pilia and Attica.

LETTER XXIX.

SILIUS, you say, is to be with you to-day. Tomorrow therefore, or rather when you can, you will let me know if you have anything to tell me after having seen him. I do not wish to avoid Brutus, yet I do not expect to derive from him any consolation. But there are reasons why I should not like to be at Rome at this time; if these continue, I must devise some excuse to Brutus; and, as things now are, they seem likely to continue. Pray bring this business of the gardens to some conclusion. The chief object is what you know. Another consideration is, that I want something for myself. For I can neither bear to live in the world nor to be at a distance from you. For this my design I find nothing more suitable than that place. Upon this subject I am persuaded of your concurrence; and the more so because I think (and I understand you are of the same opinion) that I am regarded with great affection by Oppius and Balbus. I would have you communicate to them how earnestly, and why, I wish for these gardens; but that it can only be done when that Faberian business is settled. Find out therefore whether they will sanction it; or how far they can be induced, if I forego part of my claim upon early payment; for I despair of getting the whole. In short you will discover if they are disposed to give me any assistance towards this design. If they will, it is a great point gained; if not, let us strive by any means to accomplish it. Consider it as that ancient "repose of old age," as you expressed it, or as my tomb. Nothing more is to be thought of that place at Ostia. If I cannot get this, I must try about Damasippus's. Lamia's I conceive to be unattainable.

LETTER XXX.

I THINK what I shall say to you; but there is really nothing. The same day after day. I am much obliged to you for going to see Lentulus. Let him have what servants, and what number you think right. Respecting Silius's inclination to sell, and respecting the price, you seem to apprehend, in the first place, that he may not choose it; and, in the next place, that he may not accede to the terms. Sica is of a different opinion; but I agree with you. However, I have written to Egnatius, as he wished. I have no objection to your speaking with Clodius according to Silius's desire; and this is better than that I should write to Clodius, as he asked me to do. With regard to Castricius's slaves¹, I think it best that Egnatius² should manage it; as you mention that you suppose will be done. Pray see that the account is settled with Ovia³. Since you say that it was night⁴ when you wrote, I shall expect something more in to-day's letter.

² See letter 28 of this book.

³ Egnatius was a banker employed by both Marcus and Quintus Cicero. In this transaction the latter was concerned.

⁴ See letter 21 of this book.

⁵ It is to be supposed that Atticus had alleged this as a reason for abruptly concluding his letter.

LETTER XXXI.

SICA will be surprised at Silius's having changed his mind⁷. For my part, I am more surprised at your saying, that if I should suggest a different purchase, (which he will not hear of, having destined it to some other purpose,) you think he may be induced to sell. For he imputes to his son the cause of his refusal; which seems to me not unreasonable, considering that his son is everything he could wish. You ask me what is the highest price I would give; and how much I prefer these gardens to those of Drusus. I have never been there. The Coponian villa⁸ I know to be old, and not large, and that it has a noble wood. But I know the produce of neither; which however I think it would be prudent to ascertain: though either of them are valuable to me from my particular circumstances, not from the computation of their real worth. But I would have you consider whether it is in my power to purchase them. If I could sell the Faberian property, I should not hesitate to conclude even on prompt payment for Silius's, if only he can be induced to sell. If he refuses to sell, I would apply to Drusus on the terms which Egnatius told you he demanded. Hermogenes⁹ may also be a great assistance to me in making a prompt payment. Do you only admit of my being in the disposition of one who is desirous of purchasing: yet while I am a slave to my wishes and my grief, I am willing to be directed by you. I have received a letter from Egnatius¹⁰, should he have any conversation with you, you will let me know; for it will be most convenient to negotiate through him; and this I think should be done, for I do not see how it is possible to come to any conclusion with Silius. Compliments to Pilia and Attica. I have written this with my own hand. Pray think what is to be done.

LETTER XXXII.

PUBLILIA¹ has written to me to say that her mother, in a conversation with Publius², agreed to come with him to visit me; and she adds, that if I would permit her, she would come at the same time. She uses many entreaties for this purpose, and begs me to write in answer. You see how embarrassing this is. I replied that I was even more afflicted, than when I had told her I wished to be alone; and therefore was not disposed to let her come to me at this time. I thought, if I made no reply, that she would come with her mother. Now I do not think she will: for it was evident that the letter was not her own. But I wish to avoid altogether, what I see will happen, that they should come to me. There is only one way of avoiding ⁸ Supposed to be the same as Drusus's.

⁹ A debtor of Cicero's. See letter 25 of this book.

¹⁰ This letter probably respected the sale of Drusus's place. But it may be observed that Egnatius, as Cicero's agent, had some concern with Silius likewise, and with Castricius, as appears by the preceding letters; though the latter was on Quintus's account.

¹¹ Cicero, after being divorced from Terentia, had married Publilia.

it*; which I do not like; but it is necessary. I now therefore beg you to find out how long I may remain here, without being molested. You will manage this, as you mention, with prudence. I wish you would propose to Cicero, provided it appears to you reasonable, that he should accommodate the expenses of this foreign residence to the rents arising from Argiletus and Aventinus[†], which would easily have satisfied him, if he had been at Rome, and hired a house, as he thought of doing. And when you have made this proposal to him, I should be glad if you would arrange the rest in such a manner, that I may out of those rents supply him with what is necessary. I will engage that the expenses of neither Bibulus, nor Acidinus, nor Messala, who I hear are to be at Athens, will exceed the receipts from those rents. I wish you therefore first to see who are the people to hire them, and at what rate; then, that there may be somebody* who will pay to the day; likewise what provision and equipage is wanted by the way. At Athens there can certainly be no occasion for horses; and I have at home more than can be wanted for his use on the road; as you also observe.

LETTER XXXIII.

I SHOULD like, as I told you in my letter yesterday, if Silius prove such as you suppose, and Drusus be unaccommodating, that you should make overtures to Damasippus. He has, I think, allotted portions on the shore, of I know not how many acres, at a fixed price, with which I am not acquainted. Whatever arrangements you make, you will let me know. I am very anxious about my little Attica's health; and should even fear there was some mismanagement; but that the integrity of the tutor, and attention of the physician, and the regularity of the whole family in every way, forbid me to entertain such a suspicion. Take care then. I can say no more.

LETTER XXXIV.

HERE I could remain contentedly for one in trouble, even without Sica; for Tiro is better. But since you say that I must take care I am not molested (by which I understand that you are unacquainted with the certain day of their journey^b) I have thought it more convenient for me to go thither[†]. And I perceive that you are of the same opinion. To-morrow therefore to Sica's villa near Rome; thence, as you advise, I think of going into the neighbourhood of Ficulea. Respecting what you wrote to me, as I am coming up myself, we will see about it together. I am most sensible of your kindness, diligence and prudence, both in the management of my affairs, and in consulting and advising me in the letters you send.

* By going himself to see them. See letter 34 of this book.

† Argiletus and Aventinus were districts of Rome.

§ Somebody to collect the rents, and pay them regularly.

^b See letter 33 of this book. [†] To Rome.

LETTER XXXV.

SHOULD you have come to any understanding with Silius, I shall be glad to be informed of it the very day that I arrive at Sica's house; and especially what part he wishes to have excepted. For when you mention the boundary, we must take care that it be not the very place, for the sake of which, as you know, I have been led to think of the whole business. I send you a letter from Hirtius, which is both recent and kindly written. Before I last parted from you, it never entered into my mind that a sum was to be distributed to the people, equal to the excess above a certain expense allowed by law to be laid out on a monument. This would not much affect me, but that somehow (perhaps foolishly) I should not like it to be called by any other name, than that of a temple. But however I may wish this, I doubt if I shall be able to attain it without altering the situation[†]. Pray consider how this is. For though I am less impatient, and have nearly collected myself; yet I stand in need of your counsel. Therefore I entreat you again and again more earnestly, than you like, or bear to be entreated by me, to embrace this subject with your whole heart.

LETTER XXXVI.

I WISH to have a temple: from this I am not to be diverted. I am anxious to avoid the appearance of a monument; not so much on account of the legal penalty, as that I may accomplish the deification. This I might do by erecting it near the house; but, as I have often said, I am afraid of a change of possessors. In an open field, wherever I should erect it, it seems probable that it may retain the respect of posterity. You must bear with this weakness of mine; for such I acknowledge it to be.* I cannot communicate, not even with myself, so freely as with you. If the thing, the place, the design, meets your approbation, I beg you to read over the law and send it to me. If any method of avoiding it should occur, I shall avail myself of it. If you write to Brutus, unless you think it improper, scold him for objecting to be in Cumanum on account of the reason which he mentioned to you: for, to my apprehension, he could do nothing more uncivil. If you think it right to proceed in the affair of the temple, as I have begun, I should be glad if you would exhort and quicken Cluavius[‡]. For, even if another situation appear preferable, I imagine I shall still want his advice and assistance. To-morrow you will perhaps be at your villa[†].

LETTER XXXVII.

YESTERDAY I received two letters from you; one by Hilarinus, dated the day before,—the other by the messenger on the same day. The same day also I received one from Ægypta the freed-man.

† There were already many monuments erected in these gardens on the other side of the Tiber, amongst which it would be difficult to distinguish the temple he proposed to consecrate to his daughter.

* See letter 18 of this book.

saying that Pilia and Attica were quite well. This last was delivered to me the thirteenth day. I thank you for sending me Brutus's letter. He wrote also to me. This letter I send you, and likewise a copy of my answer to it. Respecting the temple, if you find nothing for me in the gardens (which you may surely find, if you have that regard for me which you certainly have), I highly approve your proposal about Tusculanum. However judicious you may be in your plans, as indeed you are, yet, unless you took a real interest in my obtaining what I so ardently wish, that idea could never have come so appositely into your mind. But somehow I require notoriety. Therefore you must accomplish for me the possession of these gardens. The most frequented are Scapula's; besides, there is the vicinity to where you are, that it may not occupy the whole day to go thither. For this reason I should exceedingly wish you to confer with Otho^a, if he is in Rome, before your departure. If there is nothing to be had, though you are used to bear with my folly, yet I shall go on till I make you quite angry; for Drusus at least is disposed to sell. If then there is anything else, it will not be my fault if I do not buy it; but in this I beg you to take care that I commit no error. The surest way of taking care is, if I can accomplish anything about Scapula's gardens^b. I wish you likewise to inform me how long you will stay in your villa near Rome. I have need of your favour and your influence with Terentia; but you will do as you think right: for I know that where anything concerns me you take more interest in it than I do myself. Hirtius has written to me that Sex. Pompeius^c has left Corduba and fled into the more northern provinces of Spain, and that Cnæus has fled I know not whither, for it is of little consequence. I know nothing more. He dates his letter from Narbonne, the 18th of April. You wrote to me doubtfully about the shipwreck of Caninius; let me know therefore if any certain intelligence has arrived. With respect to your calling me from my sadness, you will greatly relieve me if you can find a place for the temple. Many things occur to my mind in favour of the deification; but I am greatly in want of a situation. Again, therefore, see Otho about it.

LETTER XXXVIII.

I HAVE no doubt you were very busy, which was the reason of your not sending me any letter: but he was an idle fellow not to attend your convenience when he was sent for that very purpose. At this time, unless anything has detained you, I imagine you are in your villa. I continue writing here all day without any relief, but yet with some distraction of attention. Asinius Pollio has written to me on the subject of our unnatural relation^d. What the younger Balbus lately intimated pretty plainly, and Dolabella more reservedly, he has openly declared. I should be deeply concerned if there were any room for new sources of grief. But can anything be more abominable? What a dangerous man! Though for my part—but I will restrain my feeling. Let me hear from you, as you may be at leisure; for there is nothing that presses. As to what you say, that I ought now to show the firmness of my mind,—and that some speak of me more severely than either you or Brutus write: if any persons suppose that my mind is broken and has lost its energy, let them know the extent and kind of studies in which I am engaged,—and I conceive, if they are men, they will think either that I do not deserve reproof, having so far roused myself as to bring my mind disengaged to the discussion of difficult questions; or if I have chosen this method of diverting my grief, which is at once the most liberal and the most worthy of a man of learning, that I ought rather to be commended. But while I do everything that I can for my relief, do you effect that^e, for which I perceive you are not less earnest than I am. I seem to owe this to myself, and to be incapable of ease till I have discharged it, or seen a prospect of discharging it,—that is, till I have a place such as I want. If Scapula's heirs, as you say that Otho told you, mean to have the gardens divided into four parts and valued, there is indeed no room for a purchaser. But if they are to be publicly sold, we will see what can be done. That Publician place, belonging to Trebonius and Cusinius, was offered me: but you know it is a mere barn; and I do not approve of it at all. Clodia's I like; but apprehend it is not to be sold. Though you say you quite revolt from Drusus's gardens, yet I must be content with those, unless you can find something else. The building I do not regard; for I shall build nothing more than I should do otherwise. The 4th and 5th books of Antisthenes's Cyrus please me like the other works of the same author, who is more ingenious than learned.

^a Otho might probably be one of Scapula's heirs.

^b It was to be expected that Scapula, being lately dead, his heirs would be obliged to sell these gardens in order to divide the property.

LETTER XXXIX.

WHEN the messenger arrived without a letter from you, I supposed the reason of your not writing to be that you had written the day before what I answered in that letter. Yet I had expected to hear something relating to the letter of Asinius Pollio. But I measure your leisure too much by my own. However, unless there should be something of importance, I would not have you think it necessary to write till you are quite at liberty. I would do as you advise about the messengers, if there were any letters of consequence, as there were formerly; when, during the shorter days, yet the messengers constantly returned to their time. And there was something, as Silius, Drusus, and some other matters. Now, if it were not for Otho, there would be nothing to write about: even that is deferred. Yet I find relief when I talk with you in my absence; and still more when I read your letters. But since you are out of town (for so I suppose), and there is no particular occasion for writing, our correspondence may rest till something new occurs.

^e The procuring a proper situation for a temple to be consecrated to his daughter.

LETTER XL.

WHAT will be the nature of Caesar's censure* in opposition to my commendation, I see from the book which Hirtius has sent me, in which he collects together the faults of Cato, while he speaks very highly of me. I have, therefore, sent the book to Musca, that he might give it to your librarians,—for I wish to have it made public; and that this may be the sooner done, I should be glad if you would give directions to your people. I often attempt to compose something in the way of advice†, but I cannot please myself. In this I am countenanced by the address of Aristotle and of Theopompus to Alexander. But what resemblance is there between the two cases? They wrote what was at once honourable to themselves and agreeable to Alexander. Can you devise anything of such a kind? As for me, I can suggest nothing. When you say that you fear my influence and authority may be lessened by this my grief, I know not what people should either blame or require. Is it that I should not grieve? How is that possible? That I should not sink under it? Who ever did so less? While I remained at your house, whom did I exclude? Who, that came, could be offended with me? From you I went to Astura. Those lively spirits who find fault with me cannot read so much as I wrote. How well, is nothing to the purpose: but the kind of writing was such as nobody with a broken spirit could execute. I have been thirty days in my gardens‡. Who ever found a want of access to me, or of free conversation? And now I am so engaged in reading and in writing, that my attendants find it more difficult to bear their leisure than I to bear my labour. If anybody asks why I am not at Rome? Because it is the recess. Why I am not in any of my farms, which are suitable to such a time? Because I could not easily bear so much company. Therefore I remain, where he* who possessed that excellent place at Baiae used every year to spend this season. When I come to Rome, neither my looks nor conversation will subject me to reproof. I have lost for ever that gaiety with which I used to season the sadness of these times; but there will be found no want of constancy and firmness either in my mind or speech. Respecting Scapula's gardens, it seems possible, partly by your influence partly by mine, to get them submitted to public auction. Unless this is done I shall be excluded. But if we come to an open sale, my desire of possession will outweigh Otho's wealth: for as to what you mention about Lentulus, it does not rest upon that. Let but the Faberian business* be settled, and continue to exert yourself as you do, and I shall get what I want. In answer to your inquiry how long I shall remain here,—it will be a few days; but I am not certain: as soon as I have determined, I will write to you. Do you likewise let me know how long you mean to stay in your villa. The very day on which I send this I have also received, both by letter and by word of mouth, the same account you mention of Pilia and of Attica.

* Caesar wrote a piece called "Anti-Cato," in answer to Cicero's panegyric, called "Cato."

LETTER XLI.

I HAVE nothing to say; yet I wish to know where you are,—and, if you are gone, or going, out of town, when you mean to return. You will therefore inform me. And respecting my movements, which you desire to know, I have determined to be at Lannivium on the 14th, and from thence to go the day following either to Tusculanum or to Rome; which I do, you shall know the same day. You know how querulous misfortune is,—not indeed towards you; but yet I am grown very impatient about the temple: and unless this is, I do not say completed, but unless I see it in progress, I will venture to say (and you will receive it as you are accustomed), my vexation will vent itself upon you, however undeservedly. But you will bear with me in writing this, as you do, and have borne with all my weaknesses. I should be glad to have you collect all your consolations in this one object. If you ask, what it is I wish for? First Scapula's gardens, then Clodia's; afterwards, if Silius refuses and Drusus is unreasonable, those of Cuiusius and Trebonius; I believe they belong now to Terentius; I know they did belong to Rebilus. But if you prefer Tusculanum, as you have signified in some of your letters, I shall not object to it. This then is what you must accomplish, if you wish me to be comforted; whom you now accuse more severely than is natural to you; but you do it from your great affection, and overcome perhaps by my foolishness. Yet if you wish me to be comforted this is the greatest comfort; or, if you would know the truth, the only one. If you have read Hirtius's letter,—which I consider as a specimen of the censure that Caesar has written upon Cato,—I should like you to inform me, at your convenience, what you think of it. To return to the subject of the temple; unless it is finished this summer, which is yet all before us, I shall not think myself free from guilt*.

LETTER XLII.

(Grav. xlii.)

I HAVE determined to sleep at Lannivium on the 14th, as I mentioned to you before; from thence I shall go either to Rome or to Tusculanum. You shall know both beforehand. You do rightly in taking no notice of the relief which this business* may justly afford me; it being such, believe me, as you could not suppose. The thing itself shows how earnestly I desire it, when I venture to confess it to you, who, I suspect, do not very much approve of it: but in this you must bear with my weakness. Bear with it? Nay, you must even forward it. About Otho I dare not hope; perhaps because I wish it. Besides, the purchase exceeds my ability, especially in opposition to one who is both desirous of having it, and rich, and one of the heirs. Next to this I should like Clodia's. But if these cannot be had, conclude what you will. I consider myself bound by a stricter obligation than anybody ever was by that of a vow. You will see, likewise, the Trebonian gardens, notwithstanding the owners are

* In letter 18 of this book he had said that he considered himself as bound by a vow. He alludes to the same thing likewise in letter 42 of this book.

beent; and as I mentioned to you yesterday, you will think also about Tusculanum. The summer must certainly not be suffered to slip away without doing something.

LETTER XLIII.

(Græc. Book xiii. Letter xxvi.)

I ENTIRELY approve of what you mention about Virgilius's portion². You will therefore act accordingly. That is my first wish³; next to that, Clodia's; and if I can get neither, I fear I may become outrageous and rush upon Drusus. I know no moderation in my desire of that object, which you know. Therefore at intervals I incline to Tusculanum. For anything is better than not to have it finished this summer. In my present state, I have no place where I can be more at my ease than at Astura. But as those who are with me hasten away (I suppose because they cannot bear my sadness); though I should be very well content to remain; yet, as I mentioned to you, I shall go from hence, that I may not appear deserted. But which way? To Lanuvium? I try to go to Tusculanum; but will immediately let you know. You will bring your writing⁴ to an end. For my own part, it is not to be believed how much I write in the day; and even in the night; for I get no sleep. Yesterday also I accomplished a letter to Cæsar, because you seemed to wish it. And if you thought it expedient, there is no harm in its being written. As things are at present, there is no necessity for sending it; but this shall be as you please. I will however send you a copy of it, perhaps from Lanuvium, unless it happens that I go to Rome. But you shall know to-morrow.

LETTER XLIV.

I AM very well pleased that Hirtius should have written to you with sympathy about me, for he has done it kindly; and I am still better pleased that you should not have sent me his letter, for you have done it even more kindly. I wish the book, which he sent me upon Cato, to be published by your librarians for this reason, that his praise may be exalted by the censure of that party. In acting through Mustella you have a person extremely proper, and one who has been kindly disposed towards me ever since the Pontian⁵ business. Therefore get something done⁶. What else, but to secure access to a purchaser⁷? This may be done through any of the heirs. And I apprehend Mustella⁸ will do it, if you ask him. You will thus procure for me the place which I wish, for the purpose which I have at heart; and besides, "a repose for my old age." For those of Silius, and of Drusus, do not appear to me sufficiently respectable for a family residence. How would it become one to remain for any length of time in such a villa as that? I should therefore prefer, first, Otho's; and, next to that, Clodia's. If nothing can be done, either some stratagem must be practised upon Drusus⁹, or I must be content with Tusculanum. In shutting yourself up at home, you have acted prudently. But pray use despatch, and restore yourself to me free from care. I shall go from hence, as I before-mentioned, to Lanuvium on the 14th, and the day following to Tusculanum. For I have subdued my mind¹, and perhaps conquered it, if only I can persevere. You shall know therefore, perhaps to-morrow, at all events the day after. But pray, how is this? Philotimus affirms that Pompeius is not shut up in Carteia; about which Oppius and Balbus sent me the copy of a letter to Clodius Patavinus, declaring that they believed it to be true; but that a great war is still maintained¹. He is in the habit of being a complete Fulvianster¹; but yet, if you have any intelligence, let me know it. I want also to know what is the truth respecting Caninius' shipwreck¹.

⁷ In finding a place to erect a temple to Tulla.

⁸ To get Scæpula's gardens exposed to public sale.

⁹ Mustella appears to have been one of Scæpula's heirs.

LETTER XLV.

WHILE I have been here¹, I have completed two long treatises: for I have no other means of deviating, as it were, from the path of wretchedness. Even if you have nothing to say, which I foresee will be the case, yet I wish you to tell me that, if only it is not in these terms. The accounts of Attica are excellent. I am concerned about your languor², notwithstanding you say it is nothing. In Tusculanum I shall have the advantage of more frequently hearing from you, and sometimes seeing you. In other respects things are more supportable at Astura; nor are the objects, which revive my grief, more distressing here than everywhere else³; though in truth, wherever I am, they are with me. I wrote to you about your neighbour Cæsar, because I had learned

¹ In the original is the same Greek word which was explained in letter 25 of this book, note ¹.

⁸ In the original is a Greek word of doubtful signification, but probably meaning a languor which created an indifference towards everything.

¹⁰ A statue had lately been erected to Cæsar in the temple of Quirinus, near Atticus's house, which was on the Quirinal hill.

It from your letter. I would rather have him comrade with Quirinus than with Public³ Safety. Let Hirtius be made public⁴; for I was of the same opinion, which you mention, that while our friend's genius is applauded, his attempt to censure Cato would be derided.

LETTER XLVI.

I HAVE never complained of your not writing; for I perceive what you mention¹. Besides I suspect, or rather know, that you can have had nothing to say. On the 8th I supposed you to be out of town, and concluded that there was nothing. I shall nevertheless send to you almost every day; for I would rather send in vain than that you should have nobody to take your letters, in case there should be anything with which you think I ought to be acquainted. On the 8th I received your empty letter, as you call it; for what had you to write about? Yet, such as it was, it was not unpleasant to me to know even this, that you had no news. You mentioned, however, something about Clodia. Where then is she? or when will she come? That place pleases me so well, that, next to Otho's², I like nothing better. But I do not suppose either that she will sell; for she takes pleasure in it, and is in no want of money: and as for the other, you are aware of the difficulties. Yet pray let us try, that we may devise some means of gratifying my wishes. I think of leaving this place to-morrow, and going either to Tusculanum or home³, and afterwards perhaps to Arpinum. When I know for certain, I will write to you. It had occurred to me to remind you of doing the very thing which you are doing; for I thought you could more conveniently transact the same business at home, without suffering yourself to be interrupted.

LETTER XLVII.

(Græc. xlv.)

I HOPE to conquer my feelings, and to go from Lanuvium to Tusculanum. For I must either renounce for ever that estate (since the same painful sensations will remain, only in a less degree) or I know not what it signifies whether I go there now, or ten years hence. Since the being thus reminded, is nothing more than what constantly wastes me day and night. What then, you will say, do your studies afford no relief? In this respect I fear they may even do the contrary; as I might otherwise perhaps be more insensible. For to a cultivated mind nothing is without feeling and interest.

¹ Near to the temple of Quirinus was situated the temple of Public Safety; and Cicero means to say that he should be sorry to have any tyrant in a place of safety.

² Hirtius's essay, mentioned in letter 40 of this book.

³ That you are very busy.

LETTER XLVIII.

(Græc. xlvii.)

Do then, as you mention, so that you put yourself to no inconvenience. For two words will be sufficient. Or I will go up, if it is necessary. This therefore as you can. About Mustella do as you propose; though it is a great undertaking¹. For this reason I more incline to Clodia. But in either case the Faberian account must be settled; about which there will be no harm in your having some conversation with Balbus; and indeed letting him know, what is the truth, that I am desirous of purchasing, and unable to do it without the discharge of that debt, and do not dare to engage upon an uncertainty. But since Clodia is to be at Rome, and you consider it so desirable, I look wholly that way; not that I should not prefer the other; but it is a great concern, and an arduous contest with one who is eager, who is rich, who is heir. Though in point of eagerness I will yield to nobody: in other respects I am inferior. But of this when we meet. Make² public Hirtius's book, as you do. Respecting Philotimus³, I also thought the same. I foresee that your house will become more valuable from having Cæsar for your neighbour⁴. I am expecting the return of my messenger to-day. He will bring me an account of Pilia and Attica.

LETTER XLIX.

(Græc. xlviii.)

I CAN easily believe that you are glad to be at home. But I should like to know how much remains to be done; or whether you have already finished. I am expecting you in Tusculanum; and the rather, because you wrote word to Tiro, that you were coming immediately, and added that you thought it necessary. While you were here, I was very sensible how much good you did me; but I am much more sensible of it since your departure. Therefore, as I mentioned to you in a former letter, I will either go wholly to you; or you shall come to me, so far as it will be consistent with your occupations.

LETTER L.

(Græc. xlix.)

YESTERDAY, not long after you left me I think, some persons of smart appearance brought me despatches, and a letter from "C. Marius, the son of Caius, and grandson of Caius¹," urging me at great length, by the relationship between us, by the poem which I had inscribed with the name of Marius, by the eloquence of L. Crassus, his grandfather, to undertake his defence; and he sent me a detail of his case. I wrote to him in return, that he had no need of a patron, since the whole power was in his relation Cæsar, who was an excellent man, and exceedingly liberal; but that nevertheless he should have my good wishes. What times are these! That it should ever happen that Curtius* should think of standing for the consulship! But enough of this. I am anxious about Tiro. But I shall soon know how he does, for I sent a person yesterday to see him; to whom at the same time I gave a letter for you. I send you a copy of my letter to Cæsar. I should be glad if you would let me know on what day the gardens are to be sold.

LETTER LI.

IN proportion as your arrival cheered me, so your departure afflicted me. Therefore when you can, that is, when you have done with Sextus' sale, you will come to me again. A single day will be valuable to me; I need not say, agreeable. I would myself go to Rome in order to be with you, if I had sufficiently made up my mind on a certain subject^b.

LETTER LII.

(Græv. li.)

I HAVE got Tiro with me sooner than I had apprehended. Nicias is also arrived; and I heard to-day that Valerius was coming. How many soever they may be, I shall feel myself more solitary than if you alone were here. But I hope to see you after Peduceus's^c business. You give some intimation that it may even be sooner: but this as you can. About Virgilius do as you mention^d. I want however to know when the sale takes place. I see that you approve of my sending the letter to Cæsar. To say the truth, I quite agree in the propriety of doing so; and the rather, because there is nothing in it that is unbecoming a good citizen; good at least for the times, to which all writers on government direct us to submit. But you know it was my desire that some of that party should read it first; which I wish you would take care of; and not let it be sent, unless you understand that they quite approve of it. You will easily find out whether they really think so, or only feign. Feigning would be to me a prohibition. But this you will probe. Tiro has informed me of your opinion about Cærellia; that it is unbecoming my dignity to remain in debt; and that you think I should give a note of hand—"This you fear; of the other you entertain no fear." But these, and many other matters, when we meet. With your leave, however, the payment of the debt to Cærellia must be suspended, till I know about Meto and Faberius.

LETTER LIII.

(Græv. lii.)

You know L. Tullius Montanus who went with Cicero^f. I have received a letter from his sister's husband, saying that Montanus owes Plancus 25 sestertia (200*l.*) as surety for Flaminius; and that something had been requested of you by Montanus respecting this business. If you can assist him, either by speaking to Plancus, or by any other means, I should be truly glad that you would do it: my obligation to him demands it. If, as it may happen, you are better acquainted with the business than I am, or if you think that Plancus should be solicited, I wish you would write to me; that I may know what the case is, and what to ask of him. I am expecting to hear what you have done about the letter to Cæsar. I am not very anxious about Silius^g. You must get me either Scapula's gardens, or Clodia's. But you seem to be in some doubt about Clodia, whether she will come, or when, and whether the gardens will be to be sold. What is it I hear of Spinther's being divorced? You are very confident, you will say, in the copiousness of the Latin language, to undertake such subjects^h: but they are mere transcripts, and done with less labour than you may suppose. I have only to find words, and in these I abound.

LETTER LIV.

(Græv. liii.)

THOUGH I have nothing to say to you, yet I write, because I seem then to talk with you. There are with me here Nicias and Valerius. I expect to-day a letter from you written in the morning. There will perhaps be another in the afternoon, unless your correspondence with Epirus prevents you, which I would not interrupt. I send you letters to Marcianus and to Montanus, which I should be glad if you would inclose in your packetⁱ, unless that is already gone.

^c The original is a verse, quoted also elsewhere from some unknown author. Cicero's meaning seems to be, that while Atticus was apprehensive of the debt being left unpaid, he did not advert to the embarrassment which it might occasion to Cicero to pay it, before he was himself sure of being paid by his own creditors, Meto and Faberius.

^f To Athens. See letters 8 and 24 of this book.

^g Silius's gardens. See letter 44 of this book.

^h Philosophical subjects, which, before Cicero, had not been treated in the Latin language. He goes on to say, that he drew his matter from the Greek writers, and had little trouble except in finding Latin expressions. In the conclusion of his treatise "De Finibus," we find it said in the person of Atticus,—"Sed mehercule pergrata mihi oratio tua: quæ enim dici latine posse non arbitrabar, ea dicta sunt a te, nec minus plane, quam dicuntur a Græciis."

ⁱ Which Atticus was going to send to Buthrotum in Epirus, from whence Cicero's letters would be forwarded to Athens.

¹ The same who is before mentioned. See book ix. letter 6.

^a Atticus, being a friend to Sextus Peduceus, wished to attend the sale of some part of his property.

^b From the obscure hint contained in this expression, it is probable he might allude to his conduct in the senate respecting Cæsar's authority and administration. See letters 11 and 29 of this book.

^c The same who in the preceding letter is called Sextus.

^d Virgilius was one of the heirs of Scapula, [see letter 44 of this book.] whose gardens Cicero wished to get. It is to the sale of these gardens that he refers in the subsequent sentence.

BOOK XIII.

[The arrangement of the letters in this book appears to be in several instances incorrect; yet the inconvenience, not to mention the difficulty, of altering it in a way that could be satisfactory, made it to be thought more desirable to preserve the order already established.]

LETTER I.

Nobody could have written more firmly or more temperately than you have done to Cicero¹, or more entirely as I could wish. Your letters to the Tullii² are likewise extremely prudent. So that either these must have an effect³, or we must think no more about it. I see that you are using, or rather have already used, all diligence about the money⁴. If you succeed in this, I shall owe the gardens to you. There is no kind of possession which I should like better, especially for that purpose⁵ in which I am engaged; and about which you prevent my impatience, by the assurance, or rather promise, for the summer⁶. Besides, for the decline of my life⁷, and the relief of my sorrow, nothing can be found more suitable. My wish for it sometimes urges me to exhort you; but I check myself; for I do not doubt but that in a matter, which you think I have much at heart, your wishes even exceed my own. Therefore understand this, as if it were really so. I am anxious to know what they⁸ think of my letter to Cæsar. Nicias is much attached to you, as he ought to be, and is highly gratified by your remembrance of him. On my part I have a great affection for our friend Peduceus; and transfer to him all the regard I felt for his father; besides that I value him for his own sake, as much as I valued the other; and am much obliged to you for wishing to produce this mutual attachment between us. When you have examined the gardens, and have informed me about the letter⁹, I shall have some subject to write upon. But at all events I shall write to you; for there will always be something to say.

LETTER II.

YOUR early information was more gratifying to me, than the substance of your letter. For what can be more shameful¹? But I am now grown callous to such things, and have put off all feeling. I look for a letter from you to-day; not that I expect any news; for how should there be any?

But yet—you will order the letters to be taken to Oppius and Balbus; at the same time if you can meet with Piso, you will speak to him about the gold¹. If Faberius arrives, you will see that the assignment is made (if indeed any is made) for as much as is due. You will receive the account from Eros. Ariarathes, Ariobarzanes' son², is come to Rome. I imagine he wants to purchase some kingdom from Cæsar; for at present he has no place of his own to set his foot in. Our friend Sestius has been beforehand with me as his public attendant; which I do not regret; but as I have a great friendship with his brothers, arising from the important service I rendered them³, I have written to invite him to my house. As I send Alexander for this purpose, I shall deliver this letter to him. So to-morrow is Peduceus' sale: therefore as soon as you are at liberty⁴; though Faberius may perhaps be an impediment; but however when you can. Our Dionysius makes heavy complaints, and not without reason, that he is so long kept from his scholars. He has written to me at great length, and I suppose also to you. I apprehend he will absent himself some time longer. I am sorry; for I want the man very much.

LETTER III.

I AM expecting a letter from you; though not just yet; for I write this reply to your last early in the morning. I am so well satisfied with these assignments, as to entertain no other question about them, except what arises from your hesitation. For I do not quite take it in good part that you should refer to me, who, if I negotiated the business for myself, should do nothing but by your advice. But I understand you to do it rather from the accuracy with which you always act, than because you have any real doubt about their responsibility. For you do not approve of applying to Cælius, and are against selling any more⁵. In both which I agree with you. Therefore I must have recourse to these assignments. Otherwise you must for once⁶ have been made surety, and in these very deeds. But everything shall rest upon me. As to the time of payment being distant, let me but get what I want; I imagine the day appointed by the auctioneer, or at least by the heirs, will likewise be distant. See about Crispus and Mustella; and I should like to know what is the portion belonging to these two. I had been informed of Brutus's arrival; for my freed-man Ægypta brought me a letter from him, which I send to you, as being kindly^a written.

LETTER IV.

I AM indebted to you for an elaborate account of the ten commissioners^a. And indeed I believe you are right; for the son^b was quaestor the year after Mummius was consul. Since you repeat your question, whether I am satisfied with the sureties, I repeat my answer^c, that I am. If you can make any arrangement with Piso^d, bring that business to a conclusion, for Aulus^e appears to be sincere. I hope you may be able to come sooner; but if not, at least let us be together when Brutus comes to Tusculanum. I am very desirous that we should meet. You will be able to learn what day it will be, if you give it in charge to a servant to inquire.

LETTER V.

I HAD supposed that Sp. Mummius was one of the ten commissioners; but however—For it is natural that he should have been lieutenant to his brother; and he certainly was at Corinth. I send you Torquatus^f. Talk with Silius^g, as you propose, and urge him. He objected to the day of payment being in May; to the rest he made no opposition. But you will manage this also with the same care you do everything. About Crispus and Mustella you will inform me as soon as you have settled anything. Since you promise to be with me on Brutus's arrival, I am satisfied; especially as the intervening days will be employed on my chief concern^h.

LETTER VI.

You have done properly about the aqueduct. See that I may not have to pay no tax on pillarsⁱ; though I think I heard from Camillus that the law had been altered. What answer can I make to Piso; more civil, than that Cato^k is at present ⁱ The procuring a place for the temple to be erected to his daughter.

^k This may be supposed to have been written in answer to some observation of Atticus respecting the tax which would be required on the pillars of his temple; to which he replies that he desires he may have to pay it; that is, he desires he may have some pillars. See book xii. letter 19.

alone? And this answer applies not only to the co-heirs of Herennius, but to other cases, as you know; for you acted with me in the affair of the young Lucullus^l, respecting the money which his guardian (for that ought to be noticed) had taken up in Greece. But he^m acts liberally in saying that he will do nothing contrary to my wishes. When we meet, therefore, as you observe, we will resolve how to settle this business. You have done quite right to have a meeting with the other co-heirs. I have no copy of my letter to Brutus, which you ask for; but however it is safe; and Tiro says that you ought to have it; and, as I remember, at the same time with his expository letter I sent you mine also in answer to him. You will take care that I escape the trouble of the judgeshipⁿ. I was quite ignorant of that Tuditanus who was great-grandfather to Hortensius, and supposed it to have been the son, who could not have been commissioner at that time. I consider it as certain that Mummius was at Corinth. For this Spurius, who lately died, often used to repeat to me some letters written in comic verses to his friends from Corinth. But I have no doubt he was lieutenant to his brother, and not one of the ten. And I have moreover understood that it was not customary formerly to admit among the commissioners those who were related to the commanders, as we, through ignorance, or rather negligence of their excellent institutions, sent M. Lucullus, and L. Muræna, and others nearly allied, as commissioners to L. Lucullus. But it is most natural that he should have been among the first of his brother's lieutenants. How much trouble you take, while you both attend to these matters, and despatch my business, and are much less careful about your own concerns than about mine!

LETTER VII.

I HAVE had Sestius with me; and yesterday Theopompus arrived. He reported that letters had been received from Cæsar^o, who said that he had determined to remain at Rome; and added the same reason which was mentioned in my letter^p, lest in his absence his laws should be disregarded, as had been the case with the sumptuary law. This is very natural, and what I had suspected^q. But these people must have their way^r; unless you would have me persevere in these same^s sentiments. He mentions also that Lentulus^t is certainly divorced from Metella. But all this you know better than I. Write, then, what you will in reply, so that you write something. Though I am at a loss to conceive what you can write about, unless, perhaps, about Mustella, or unless you have seen Silius. Brutus came to Tusculanum^a yesterday, past four in the afternoon; to-day, therefore, he will call upon me. I wish it had been while you were here. I desired he might be informed that you had waited for him as long as you could; that you would come when you heard of his arrival; and that I would, as I do, give you immediate notice of it.

LETTER VIII.

I HAVE positively nothing to say to you; for it is not long since you left me; and soon after you returned my triple tablets^v. I shall be obliged to you to let the parcel be taken to Vestorius, and to desire somebody to inquire if any farm belonging to Q. Faberius^v in the neighbourhood of Pompeii or of Nola is to be sold. I should be glad if you would send me Brutus's epitome of Cælius's history^x, and get from *Philoxenus Panæti*us's treatise on Prudence. I shall see you on the 15th with your family.

LETTER IX.

You had just gone away yesterday, when *Trebati*us came; and soon after, Curtius; the latter to pay his compliments; but on being invited, he stayed. *Trebati*us continues with me. This morning Dolabella came. We had a long conversation till the day was far advanced. I can describe nothing more attentive or more affectionate^v. We came at length to the subject of young Quintus, of whom he related many particulars not to be repeated or named; and one thing of such a kind, that, unless the whole army knew it, I should not only not venture to dictate to Tiro, but not even to write it myself.—But I check myself. Torquatus arrived very seasonably, while Dolabella was with me; and Dolabella in the kindest manner explained the terms I had used in discoursing with him^x; for I had just been discoursing most urgently, which seemed to be gratefully received by Torquatus. I am longing to know if you have heard anything of Brutus^x. Though Nicias supposed it to have actually taken place, but that the divorce was not approved: for which reason I am the more

^a Brutus had a villa in the neighbourhood of Tusculum, not far from Cicero's.

^v The Romans carried about with them little tablets of wood, or ivory, covered with wax, called pugillares, on which they wrote with a stilus. These tablets consisted of two, three, or more leaves, and were accordingly called duplices, triplices, &c. Cicero, it may be supposed, had written to Atticus on one of these consisting of three leaves, which Atticus had returned with his answer.

^v The same of whom mention is made, book xii. letter 25, and elsewhere.

^x Brutus may probably have epitomised several histories. In book xii. letter 5, we read of his epitome of Fannius's History; and Plutarch has reported, that on the evening previous to the battle of Pharsalia, he was engaged in making an abridgment of Polybius.

^y Dolabella had married Cicero's daughter, whose death he so deplored. It is doubtful whether a divorce between them had taken place or not; at least there seems to have been no ill-will between the parties.

^z On the subject of Torquatus.

^a Who repudiated his wife Clodia, and was going to marry Porcia, Cato's daughter. Cicero hoped that Cato's popularity might obliterate any disapprobation excited by this divorce.

anxious, as well as you; that if any offence is taken, this may heal it. I am obliged to go to Arpinum, as it is necessary for me to regulate those small farms; and I am apprehensive that I may not be able to get away, if I wait till Cæsar comes; of whose arrival Dolabella entertains the same opinion which you formed from Messala's letter. When I get there, and find what business is to be done, I will write to inform you about the time of my return.

LETTER X.

I AM not surprised that you should be deeply concerned about Marcellus^b, and apprehensive of all kinds of danger. For who would be afraid of what had never happened before, and what human nature seemed incapable of committing? So that everything is now to be feared. But do you^c of all people transgress the evidence of history, by saying that I am the only consular^d remaining? What! do you make no account of Servius? Though this has no weight with me, especially as I think the condition of the others^e no way inferior. For what am I? Or what can I be, either at home or in public? In fact, unless it had occurred to my mind to occupy myself in writing, I should not know which way to turn myself. I think I must do, as you mention, to Dolabella, and take some subject of more common and public interest. I must at all events compose something; for he earnestly desires it. If Brutus has come to any conclusion^f, you will take care to let me know it. I think he should conclude it as soon as possible, if only he has made his determination: for he will thus either extinguish or appease all idle talk. There are some who even talk to me about it. But he will conduct this best himself, especially if he also consults with you. It is my intention to go from hence the 22d. For here I have nothing to do; nor indeed there, nor anywhere; there^g, however, there is something. I expect Spinther to-day; for Brutus has sent to inform me. In his letter he exculpates Cæsar on the death of Marcellus. But no suspicion would fall upon him, even if he had been killed insidiously. Now, however, when it is clear that it was done by Magius, is not the whole to be imputed to his insanity? I am at a loss to understand this^h; therefore you will explain it; though I have no further doubt, excepting about what may have been the cause of Magius's madness; for whom he had even been surety at Sunium. It was perhaps that very circumstance; for he was insolvent. I imagine he may have asked something from Marcellus, and Marcellus may have replied, with that firmness which was natural to him, that "things seem near, and at a distance, have not the same aspectⁱ."

^b He had been killed near Athens by P. Magius Chilo, one who had been his friend.

LETTER XI.

I IMAGINED the removal to Arpinum to be a slight matter; but I find it quite otherwise, since I have been separated further from you. It was however expedient, both for the sake of reletting the farms, and to avoid imposing on our friend Brutus so great a burden of civility¹. Hereafter we shall be able better to cultivate a mutual friendship in Tusculanum². But at this time, when he was so good as to visit me daily, and I was unequal to go to him, he was deprived of all comfort in his Tusculan villa. If, then, Servilia³ is arrived; if Brutus has concluded anything⁴, or even if he is resolved upon it; when they go⁵ to meet Cæsar; in short, whatever occurs, which I ought to know, you will inform me. Converse with Piso⁶, if you can: you see how ripe the business⁷ is. Yet do not put yourself to inconvenience.

LETTER XII.

YOUR accounts of my dear Attica have much affected me; yet at the same time they have afforded me comfort. For your own consolation, expressed in the same letters, is a sufficient warrant for the relief of my anxiety. You have famously sold the speeches in favour of Ligarius. Henceforward whatever I publish, I shall employ you to proclaim. As to what you say about Varro, you know that my compositions used formerly to consist of orations, or something of that kind, in which it was impossible for me to introduce Varro's name. But since I entered upon these philosophical inquiries, Varro has already given me notice of a great and weighty address¹: two years have elapsed, while that Callipides² in his continual course has not advanced a foot. In the mean time I prepared myself, as he desired, to make him a return "according to the same measure"—or better if I could," for so Hesiodus adds. I have now pledged to Brutus, with your approbation, that treatise on the Foundation of Moral Duty, with which I am very well pleased. And you have assured me of his kind acceptance of it. I may as well, therefore, remove from my Academical Disputations the present speakers, who are distinguished characters distressed fortunes, which before he did not know, when he engaged to be his surety. Some have supposed this quotation to belong to the following letter; in which case it would mean that Cicero, since his removal to Arpinum, found the actual separation from Atticus more grievous than he had expected in distant contemplation.

¹ In calling every day upon Cicero, who had not sufficiently recovered his spirits to wait upon Brutus in return.

² Brutus, as well as Cicero, appears to have had a residence in the neighbourhood of Tusculum.

³ Brutus's mother.

⁴ Relating to his marriage with Porcia.

⁵ This is generally supposed to mean Brutus; but it seems to me more reasonable to understand it generally of people going to meet Cæsar on his return from Spain.

indeed, but by no means philosophical, and discourse with too much subtlety, and substitute Varro in their place. For there are the opinions of Antiochus, to which he is much attached. I can find a place for Catulus and Lucullus elsewhere, if you approve of these persons; and I shall be glad if you will write in answer to me upon this subject. I have received a letter from Vestorius about Brinnius's auction¹. He says that the business has without any dispute been referred² to me, to take place on the 24th of June. For they supposed that I should be in Rome, or in Tusculanum. You will therefore tell either your friend S. Vettius, my co-heir, or my friend Labeo, to defer a little the sale, as I shall not be in Tusculanum till about the 7th of July. You have with you Eros³, as well as Piso. Let us think, with all our minds, of Scapula's gardens. The day is at hand.

LETTER XIII.

IN consequence of the letter you wrote to me about Varro, I have taken the Academy⁴ entirely out of the hands of those distinguished personages, and transferred it to our friend; and from two books I have made it into four. These are longer than the others were, though there are several parts left out. I am very desirous of hearing from you, who understood that he was pleased with my design. I want also to know who it was that you understood excited his envy; unless perhaps it was Brutus. That was the only thing which remained⁵. But yet I should like much to know. In truth, unless my self-love deceive me, those books have come out in such a manner, that there is nothing of the same kind like them even in Greek. You will patiently bear the loss of your copy⁶ having been transcribed to no purpose. This, however, will be far more brilliant, more condensed, and better. I am now in doubt which way to turn⁷. I am desirous of gratifying Dolabella's wishes; but can find no proper subject. At the same time "I respect the Trojans"⁸: and if I should find something, I do not see how I can escape reproach. I must either give it up therefore, or I must devise something else. But why do I regard these trifles? How, I beseech you, does my dear Attica, for whom I am very anxious? But I frequently recur to your letter, and feel satisfaction in it; yet I look for further accounts.

⁷ What work I shall next undertake.

⁸ The original is from Homer, and has been more than once quoted before. [See book ii. letter 5, and book vii. letter 1.] The meaning is, that he had too much respect for honest citizens to write anything unbecoming the republic.

LETTER XIV.

BRINNIUS's freed-man, my co-heir, wrote to me to say, that, if I pleased, he and Sabinus Albius, two joint heirs, would come to wait upon me. I entirely disapprove of it; the inheritance is not worth it. Besides, they may easily attend the day of the sale, which is the 11th, if they will come to me in Tusculanum on the morning of the 8th, the day after my arrival. Or if they wish to put it off longer, they may do it for two or three days, or as long as they please; for it makes no difference. Therefore unless they are already set out, I would have you stop them. Let me know if there is any news of Brutus; or if you have any intelligence of Cæsar; or if there is anything else. I should wish you to consider again and again whether you approve of sending to Varro what I have written; though there is something also which concerns yourself; for you must know that you are introduced as a third personage in that dialogue^b. I think then we should consider, notwithstanding the names are already inserted. But they may either be erased or altered.

LETTER XV.

PRAY, how is my Attica? For I have had no letter from you these three days. This is not to be wondered at, as nobody came from Rome, and possibly there was no reason for writing. In consequence I have myself nothing to write about. But the day on which I deliver this to Valerius, I am expecting one of my people, who if he arrives, and brings anything from you, I am persuaded I shall be at no loss what to say.

LETTER XVI.

THOUGH I went in pursuit of streams and solitudes, that I might better be able to support myself, I have hitherto not stirred a foot out of the house; such great and continued rains have we had. I have transferred that whole Academical composition to Varro. It had at first been in the names of Catulus, Lucullus, and Hortensius. Afterwards, as this appeared unsuitable, owing to these persons being, not indeed unlearned, but notoriously unversed in such subjects, as soon as I got home I transferred those dialogues to Cato and Brutus. Your letter about Varro is just arrived. The opinions of Antiochus could be more fitly supported by nobody. Yet I should wish you to inform me, in the first place, whether you think anything should be inscribed to him; then, if you think so, whether this is the properest thing. What of Servilia? Is she yet arrived? Is Brutus doing anything^c? or when? What is heard of Cæsar? I shall be in Tusculanum on the 7th, as I mentioned^d. You will settle with Piso^e, if you can.

^b The "Academica" being written in the form of dialogues.

LETTER XVII.

ON the 27th I hope to receive something from Rome; not that I had given any particular directions. Therefore, send something by your own people. I must repeat the same inquiries; what Brutus intends? or if he has taken any steps? and whether there is anything from Cæsar? But what are these things? which I care little about: I want to know how my Attica does. Though your letter, which is already too old, bids me hope the best, yet I look for some recent information.

LETTER XVIII.

YOU see the advantage of being near^f. Let us then conclude the purchase of the gardens^g. While I was in Tusculanum I seemed to be talking with you; so frequent was the intercourse of our letters. But that will presently be the case again^h. In the mean time, at your suggestion, I have completed the books to Varro with some acuteness. Still I wait for your answer to what I wrote to you: first, by what means you understood that he wished it of me; since he, who is himself so great a writer, never addressedⁱ anything to me: then, who it is that he envied, unless perhaps Brutus^j. For if he does not envy him, much less Hortensius^k, or those who speak upon the republic. I wish you distinctly to inform me in the first place, whether you continue in the same mind, that I should send him what I have written, or whether you think there is no occasion for it. But of this when we meet.

LETTER XIX.

MY secretary Hilarus, to whom I had given a letter for you, was just gone on the 28th, when the messenger arrived with your letter dated the day before; in which it was particularly gratifying to me that my Attica begs you not to be uneasy, and that you say there is no danger. Your authority, I see, has famously recommended the Ligarius oration. For Balbus and Oppius wrote to me to say that they were extremely pleased with it, and had in consequence sent it to Cæsar, as you mentioned to me before. In the case of Varro, I am not moved by any apprehension of appearing vain-glorious^l; for I had determined to include no living characters in my dialogues^m; but since you inform me that Varro is desirous of it, and sets a great value upon it, I have composed this work, and completed the whole Academical discussion in four books; I know not how well, but with such care, that nothing can exceed it. In these, what had been excellently collected by Antiochus against the doctrine of incomprehensibility, I have attributed to Varro; to this I reply in my own person, and you are the third in our conversation. If I had made Cotta and Varro disputing with each other, as you suggest in your last letter, mine would be a mute character. This has a good effect in old people; as Heraclides has done in several books; and I in the six books on Government. I have three books also on Oratory, with which I am much satisfied; and in these likewise the characters are such, that it became me to be silent. For the speakers are, Crassus, Antonius, Catulus the old man, C. Julius brother to Catulus, Cotta, and Sulpicius. The discourse is supposed to be held while I was a boy, so that it was impossible for me to sustain any part in it. But what I have lately written are in the manner of Aristotle, where the conversation is so managed, that he himself has the principal part. I have finished the five books on the Foundation of Moral Duty, so as to give the Epicurean doctrine to L. Torquatus, the Stoical to M. Cato, the Peripatetic to M. Piso; for I considered that their being dead would preclude all jealousy. These Academics, as you know, I had discussed in the persons of Catulus, Lucullus, and Hortensius; but in truth the subject did not suit their characters; being more logical than what they could be supposed ever to have dreamed of. Therefore, when I read your letter about Varro, I seized it as an inspiration. Nothing could be more adapted to that species of philosophy, in which he seems to take particular delight; or to the support of such a part, that I could manage to avoid making my own sentiments predominant. For the opinions of Antiochus are extremely persuasive, and are so carefully expressed, as to retain the acuteness of Antiochus, with my own brilliancy of language, if indeed I possess any. But consider again and again whether you think these books ought to be attributed to Varro. Some things occur to me upon the subject; but these when we meet.

LETTER XX.

I HAVE received from Cæsar a letter of condolence, dated April 30th, from Seville. I have not heard what has been promulgated about extending the city^a; and should be glad to know. I am pleased that my services are kindly received by Torquatus, and shall not fail to increase them. It is impossible for me now to add to my Ligarian oration anything about Tubero's wife and daughter-in-law; for the speech has been widely disseminated; nor have I any wish to defend Tubero, who is wonderfully fond of accusing people. You have had truly a fine exhibition^b. Though I am very well satisfied with this place^c, yet I am desirous of seeing you, and shall accordingly return, as I intended. I imagine you have had a meeting with my brother, and I want therefore to know what you havedone^d. I am in no trouble about my reputation, whatever I may foolishly have written to you at that time. There is nothing better (for there is no other just object of care) than this^e; that everybody through his whole life should not deviate a hair's breadth from a right conscience. Observe how philosophically I talk. Do you suppose I am engaged in these speculations to no purpose? I should be sorry to have you vexed; for it was nothing^f. And, to return again to the same point, do you think that I have altogether any other care than that I may not be deficient towards him^g? Or is this my object forsooth, that I may appear to preserve the public opinion? "For on these things there is no dependence^h." I wish I were able to bear my domestic troublesⁱ as easily as I can disregard these. But you suppose me to have wished something which has not been accomplished. Is it not allowable, then, to have one's own opinion? But, however, what was then done^j I cannot help approving; and yet I can very well lay aside all care about it, as indeed I do. But more than enough of trifles.

LETTER XXI.

I DELIVERED a long letter to Hirtius, which I had just written in Tusculanum. To that, which you sent me there, I shall reply at some other time; at present I wish to advert to others. What can I say about Torquatus, till I have heard something from Dolabella? As soon as that happens, you shall immediately know. I expect a messenger from him to-day, or at farthest to-morrow, who shall be sent on to you as soon as he arrives. I am expecting to hear from Quintus; for when I was setting out from Tusculanum on the 24th, as you know, I sent a messenger to him. To return to my business; that expression of yours, which had wonderfully pleased me, now exceedingly displeases; for it is altogether a nautical term, as indeed I knew; but I thought that when the rowers were ordered inhibere, "to back their oars," they suspended their motion. Yesterday, however, upon the arrival of a vessel at my villa^k, I learnt that this was not the case; for they do not suspend them, but move them in another manner. This is quite different from the Greek τροχῶ. Therefore ^a Towards reconciling Cicero and Quintus. See the ninth and following letters of book xi.

^b So I understand this passage, which has been variously interpreted by different commentators.

^c I conceive this alludes to some expression fallen from Atticus, probably on the occasion of Quintus Cicero.

^d This seems to be written under a sense of philosophical propriety, by which he was taught to be anxious about nothing but his own conduct.

^e In the original is a fragment only of a Greek sentence, which, in our ignorance of the remainder, must be supplied by conjecture.

^f Meaning, no doubt, his affliction for his daughter, as well as his concern about Terentia and Quintus.

^g Respecting his conduct towards his brother, who seemed to take offence at Cicero's advancing money to Pompeius, while he suffered Quintus to remain in difficulties. [See book xi. letter 13.] ^h I am aware that the latter part of this letter has been very differently interpreted, and supposed by some able commentators to relate to Cicero's success in the forum, for which I see no sufficient grounds.

ⁱ On the banks of the Liris, or Garigliano.

^b Probably alluding to some application, or perhaps altercation between Tubero and these ladies before Atticus.

let it stand in the book, as it was. Mention this also to Varro, unless he has already altered it. For there is no better word than I had used before, and which is warranted by the authority of Lucullus. Carneades also makes the guard of the boxer, and the action of the charioteer holding in his horses, to correspond with ενοχη; but the backing the oars is attended with motion, and that a considerable one, while the ship is turned round to the stern. You see how much more I care about this, than either about public rumour⁷; or about Pollio⁸: let me hear also about Pansa⁹, if anything certain is known; for I imagine it has been made public; and if there has been any news of Critonius, or anything ascertained respecting Metellus and Balbinus. Tell me, is it your pleasure to publish my writings first, without my leave? Not even Hermodorus did this, who used to divulge Plato's books; from whence came the proverb, "Hermodorus deals in words¹⁰." How is this? Do you think it right that anybody should have it before Brutus, whom I addressed at your suggestion¹¹. For Balbus wrote me word that he had transcribed the fifth book of the Foundations of Moral Duty from you; in which I have not indeed altered much; yet something. But you will do well to keep back the others; that Balbus may not receive them uncorrected, or Brutus when they are stale. But enough of these matters, that I may not seem to be diligent about trifles. Though now these things are the greatest with which I have to do. For what else is there? I am using such despatch in sending to Varro what I have written at your suggestion, as already to have forwarded it to Rome to be transcribed. You may, if you please, have it immediately; for I have written to my clerks to let yours, if you wished it, have the liberty of copying it; but you will keep it private till I see you; as you always do with great care, when I have desired it. But in consequence of my having omitted to mention this to you, Cærellia, glowing with a wonderful passion for philosophy, copies from your people, and is in the possession of these same books on the Foundations of Moral Duty. And I assure you (subject indeed to human fallibility) that she did not receive them from my people; for they were never out of my sight; and they were, besides, so far from making two copies, that it was with difficulty they completed one. I do not however impute any fault to your clerks: and that I would have you understand; for I had omitted to say that I did not yet wish them to get abroad. What! still upon trifles? For upon subjects of importance I have nothing to say. I agree with you about Dolabella. Let the co-heirs¹², as you mention, come to Tusculanum. Balbus has written to me about Cæsar's arrival, that it will not be before the 1st of August. The account of Attica is excellent, that she has less fever, is quieter, and bears her illness with patience. As to what you say upon that subject for our consideration¹³, in which I take no less interest than you; so far as I know, I greatly approve of the gentleman, his family, and fortune. What after all is the chief thing, I am not personally acquainted with him; but I hear favourable reports from Scrofa. He likewise lives very near you, if this is anything to the purpose; and is more noble¹⁴ than his father. When we meet therefore—and it will be with a mind disposed to approve. For in addition to what I have said, I have a regard for his father, as I believe you know, and greater than not only you, but than he is aware of; and that, both deservedly, and of long standing.

LETTER XXII.

It is not without reason that I ask so particularly what you think best about Varro. Some things occur to me, which I shall reserve till we meet. I have been very glad to interweave your name, which I shall do frequently; for it was by your last letter that I first understood you did not object to it. About Marcellus¹⁵ I had before heard from Cassius; and Servius sent me the particulars. What a sad affair! To come back to my first subject; there is no place, where I would rather have my writings remain, than with you. But I should like not to have them sent abroad, till we both approve of it. I exempt your clerks from all blame, and do not mean to find fault with you; notwithstanding what I wrote to you, that Cærellia had some, which she could only have had from you. I was aware of the propriety of gratifying Balbus¹⁶; I only wished that it might not be given to Brutus when it was grown stale, or to Balbus when it was imperfect. I will send the books to Varro, if you think it right, as soon as I have seen you. You shall know the cause of my hesitation when we meet. In calling upon the assignees, you have done quite right. I am sorry you should have so much trouble about your grandmother's estate. The case of our friend Brutus is very vexatious; but it is the condition of human life. The ladies¹⁷ are a little unreasonable in bearing such hostile dispositions, while neither of them are chargeable with dereliction of their duty. There was no occasion to call upon my secretary Tullius. If there had been, I would have sent you word. For nothing has been deposited with him under the title of a vow¹⁸; though he has some money belonging to me, which I have determined to apply to this purpose. So that both I told you rightly where it was; and he rightly denied having anything under that title. But let us at once enter upon this business¹⁹. For the consecration of men²⁰, I do not quite approve of a grove, because it is too unfrequented; notwithstanding it has a reputation of sanctity. But this also shall be as you think proper; for you are my guide in everything. I shall be at Tusculum, as I appointed^m; and I wish you could be there the same day. But if anything should prevent you (as many things may), at least the next day, when the co-heirs are to come, by whom it would be cruel to be beset without you. Again another letter without a word about Attica; but this I place among the best signs. I find fault with this; not that you, but that she should not so much as send her compliments. But do you make my very best compliments both to her, and to Pilia; do not however give a hint of my being offended. I send Cæsar's letter, in case you should not have read it.

LETTER XXIII.

To the letter which I received from you yesterday in the forenoon, I immediately replied; I now answer that of the afternoon. I wish Brutus had rather sent for me; which was more reasonable, considering the sudden and distant journey upon which he was goingⁿ; and, to say the truth, under our present feelings, when we are incapable of enjoying each other's society (for you know in what principally consists the pleasure of living together) I should readily have acceded to our meeting in Rome, rather than in Tusculanum. The books to Varro were no impediment; for they have been re-made^o, as you have seen; they only wait to have the errors of the clerks corrected. You know my hesitation about these books; but you are answerable. Those which I am to send to Brutus, are likewise in the hands of the transcribers. Get my business settled, as you mention; though Trebatius tells me they all make those deductions. What do you think these people will do! You are well acquainted with the house. Conclude it then in affability. You cannot believe how much I disregard such concerns. I assure you in the most solemn manner, and would have you believe me, that my paltry possessions are more plague than pleasure to me; and that I am more distressed by having nobody^p on whom I should bestow them, than gratified by having them to use. Trebatius also said that he had mentioned the circumstance^q to you. But perhaps you were afraid I should be sorry to hear it. That indeed was kindly intended; but, believe me, I do not now care about such matters. Therefore enter into negotiation, and clip it as you will, and make an end of it. Rouse them, call, speak to them, as if you thought you were speaking with that Scæva^r.

^o It being generally agreed that the word defecti must be erroneous, I have supposed, with the least alteration, that it ought to be refecti; a word sufficiently appropriate, if it is considered that the work had been altogether re-cast, the characters changed, and the number of books extended from two to four. See letter 13 of this book.

LETTER XXIV.

WHAT is this which I hear from Hermogenes Clodius, that Andromenes had told him he had seen Cicero^u at Corcyra? For I suppose it must have been known to you^v. Has he then sent no letter even by him? Or has he not seen him? Let me know how this is. What more should I say to you about Varro? The four books are in your possession, and I shall be satisfied with whatever you do. I am restrained by no "respect for the Trojans^w;" why should I? I was rather afraid how well he might himself^x like it. But since you undertake it, I shall rest at ease.

LETTER XXV.

RESPECTING the deductions^y I have already replied to your very accurate letter. You will make an end of it therefore, and without any hesitation, or revision. It is proper and expedient that this should be done. About Andromenes^z, I had supposed it must be as you say, otherwise you would have known it, and mentioned it to me. While you write so much about Brutus, you say nothing of yourself^a. But when do you suppose he will come to Tusculanum? For on the 14th I am going to Rome. What I meant to say to Brutus (but what I perhaps expressed indistinctly, since you mention your having read it) was, that I had understood from your letter, that he wished me not to go up at this time merely for the sake of waiting upon him. But as the appointed time of my going^b is so near, I beg that you will take care that this may be no impediment to his coming to Tusculanum for his own convenience. For I had no intention of calling upon him about the sale, since you alone are quite sufficient in a business of that kind. But I wanted him to attest my will^c; which I should now prefer executing at another time, that I may not seem to have come to Rome for that purpose^d. I have accordingly written to Brutus, what I really thought, that there was no occasion for his being there on the 15th^a. I should be glad then if you would manage this whole business so, that I may not in the least interfere with Brutus's convenience. But what is it that you are at length afraid of, because I desire the books to be given to Varro on your responsibility? Even now, if you have any doubt, let me know it. In elegance of style they have not been surpassed. I should like Varro, especially as he desires it; but he is, as you know, "a stern man, and one who might easily take exception without just cause". Accordingly I often picture to myself his countenance, complaining, it may be, that my part is more copiously defended in those books than his; though you will perceive that this is not the case, if ever you get into Epirus, and have leisure to examine them. For at present I give way to your correspondence with Alexio^s. I do not however despair of their meeting with Varro's approbation; and after being at the expense of large paper^b, I shall not be sorry to have that design adhered to. But I say again and again, that it must be on your responsibility. Therefore if you have any hesitation, let us transfer it to Brutus; for he also is an Antiochian^c. O variable Academy, and like itself; now here, now there^d. But, pray how did you like my letter to Varro? May I die, if I ever study any work, as I have done this. I have not even dictated to Tiro, who is used to write down whole sentences; but to Spintherus, syllable by syllable.

N. B. The 26th letter was before inserted in its proper place, after the 43d of book xii.]

LETTER XXVII.

RESPECTING the letter to Cæsar^k, I was always of opinion that it ought first to be submitted to his friends. Otherwise I should have been not only wanting in attention to them, but should also have exposed myself to some danger, in case of his being offended with me. They have acted ingenuously; and I take it kindly that they have not concealed what they thought. Especially they have done well in suggesting so many alterations, that the writing it afresh is more than the occasion demands. On the subject of the Parthian war, however, what ought I to have considered, but what I supposed him to wish? For what other argument could my letter admit, besides flattery? Had I wished to recommend what I thought best, should I have wanted matter? Therefore the whole letter is unnecessary. For where the advantage to be gained cannot be great; and a failure, even if it be not great, may be productive of vexation; what need is there of running the risk? Especially when I consider, that having written nothing before, he would expect that I should write nothing till the whole war was at an end. I am even apprehensive that he may imagine I wished this to be as a soother for my "Cato". In short, I repented of having written, and nothing could fall out more to my mind, than that my labour was not approved. Besides, I should have exposed myself to the calumnies of Cæsar's adherents, and among them to those of your relation^m. But I returnⁿ to the subject of the gardens. I would by no means have you go thither but with perfect convenience to yourself; for there is no hurry. Whatever be the result, let us use our endeavours about Faberius. Respecting the day of sale, however, when you know anything, you will inform me. As the messenger, who came from Cumanum, reports that Attica is quite well, and says that he has a letter for you, I send him on to you without delay.

LETTER XXVIII.

As you were to inspect the gardens to-day, I shall hear to-morrow what you have thought of them. About Faberius you will let me know, when he is arrived. Respecting the letter to Cæsar, believe me when I swear that I cannot do it. Not that the baseness of it deters me; (though it ought exceedingly; for how base is flattery?) since it is base for me even to be alive. But, as I was saying, it is not this baseness that deters me; I wish it was; for I should then be what I ought to be: but nothing occurs to my mind. For with regard to the exhortations of those eloquent and learned men^o to Alexander, you see on what subjects they are employed. They are addressed to a young man inflamed with the love of the truest glory, and asking for advice in the pursuit of lasting praise. It is easy to speak in an honourable cause. But what can I do? Yet I carved out from my wooden materials something that might look like an image; and in this, because there were some things a little better than what are doing, and have been done, they are censured. But I by no means regret this; for if that letter had been delivered, believe me, I should be sorry for it. What? Do not you see how that very disciple of Aristotle, with all his understanding and all his moderation, after he got the title of king, became haughty, cruel, intemperate? And do you suppose this man^p from amidst his processions, the comrade of Quirinus^q, will be pleased with this temperate letter of mine? But let him rather want what is not written than disapprove what is written. In short, as he pleases. That Archimedean problem', which once stimulated me, and which I referred to you, is past. Now, indeed, I wish for that issue or any issue^a, much more ardently than I formerly dreaded it. Unless something else prevent you, I shall be very glad to see you here. Nicias has been earnestly sent for by Dolabella, for I read the letter; and though it was against my inclination, yet it was at my instance that he went. This in my own hand.

LETTER XXIX.

WHILE I was inquiring of Nicias different things relating to literary people, I felt, as it were, by chance upon the subject of Talna^a. He made no great account of his abilities, but said that he was modest and prudent. He added, however, what I did not like, that he said he knew he had lately paid his addresses to Cornificia, the daughter of Quintus^b, who was an old woman, and had been married several times; but the match was not approved by the ladies, who found out that his property did not exceed 800 sester tia (6400*l.*). This I have thought it right you should know. I have learned about the gardens, both from your letter and from Chrysippus^c. In the house, with the dulness of which I was well acquainted, I understand there has been little or no alteration. However, he speaks well of the larger bath, and says that out of the smaller may be constructed some winter apartments^d. A covered place for exercise must therefore be added; which, if it is made as large as that in Tusculanum, will not cost much more than half the price, in this place. But for that temple which I want, nothing seems more appropriate than the grove with which I was formerly acquainted; but at that time it was little frequented; now I hear it is very much so: there is nothing that I should prefer to it. On this subject I entreat you to bear with my extravagance. It remains, that if Faberius pays me that debt, I would not have you make a question about the price. I would have you outbid Otho. At the same time I do not suppose he will exceed the bounds of reason; for I think I know the man. But I hear he has been so roughly^e treated, that I do not think he will care to be a purchaser. What? Would he suffer?—But why do I reason about it? If you settle this Faberian account, let me have it though at a dear rate: if not, I must not think of it even at a cheap one. Let us try Clodia therefore, from whom I entertain hope, both on account of their being much cheaper, and because Dola-bella's debt^f is on the point of being liquidated, so that I may trust to paying in ready money. Enough about the gardens. To-morrow I hope to see you, unless some business prevent; which I wish may be Faberius's. However, if you can.

LETTER XXX.

I RETURN you Cicero's^g letter. O hard-hearted man, who are not moved with his dangers^h! He accuses me also. I should have sent you his letter; for as to the other respecting his achievements, I take it to be a copy of yours. I have sent a messenger to Cumanum to-day, to whom I have entrusted your letter to Vestorius, which was brought by Pharnaces. I had just despatched Demea to you, when Eros arrived. But there was no news in the letter he brought, excepting that the saleⁱ would be in two days. Therefore after that^j, as you mention; and I wish the Faberian business may previously have been settled. Eros, says he^k, will not come to-day; but thinks he may to-morrow morning. You must pay him attention; though such flattery is not far removed from guilt. I shall hope to see you the day after to-morrow. Find out, if you can, who were the ten commissioners sent to Mummius^l. Polybius does not mention their names. I remember only the consular Albinus, and Sp. Mummius, and think I have heard Hortensius name Tuditanus. But in Libo's annals it appears that Tuditanus was made praetor fourteen years after Mummius's consulship; which does not accord. I think of writing some political congress, supposed to be held at Olympia, or where you will, after the manner of your friend Dicaearchus.

LETTER XXXI.

ON the morning of the 28th I received by Demea^a a letter dated the day before, by which I might expect you either to-day or to-morrow. But I apprehend that longing, as I do, for your arrival, I shall myself be the occasion of stopping you. For I cannot suppose the Faberian business will be so soon despatched (even if it is in train) but that it will meet with some impediment. When you are at liberty therefore^b; as you are still likely to be kept. I shall be glad if you will send me the books of Dicaearchus, which you mention, and likewise his cardines^c. ^h It appears by the preceding letter that Cicero had sent this Demea before to Atticus, and it is to be supposed that he brought back a letter from Atticus to Cicero, which is that spoken of. The expression of the text is liable to the same ambiguity as that in the translation.

ⁱ The sense is obvious, that he wished Atticus to come to him as soon as he was at liberty. I have thought the conclusion of the sentence was sufficiently clear, without adding to the original.

^j Meaning his book upon the descent into Trophonius's cave, which was before mentioned. See book vi. letter 2.

^a This probably means the embarrassment in which he found himself upon his return to Italy after the defeat of Pompeius, of which he speaks so much in book xi., when he doubted what steps he ought to take to conciliate Caesar, and dreaded the effects of his displeasure.

^b Banishment, or death, now appears more desirable to him than a life of sorrow and dissatisfaction, after the loss of his daughter, and loss of the freedom of the state.

^c It seems probable that this may have been somebody whom Atticus thought of as a husband for Attica.

Cæsar I am quite determined. And the very thing which they say he mentions in his letter, that he will not go against the Parthians till affairs at home are settled, is the same that I advised in my letter. But were it otherwise, whichever he chose to do, he might, with my consent. For does he wait for this forsooth? And will he do nothing but by my advice? Let us, I beseech you, have done with this, and be at least half-free; which we may yet be by saying nothing, and keeping quiet. But speak to Otho, as you propose; and make an end, my Atticus, of that business¹. For I can find no other place where I can be with you, and yet not be in the forum. With regard to the price, this has occurred to me. C. Albanus is the nearest neighbour; who bought of M. Pilius 1000 acres, as well as I remember, for 11,500 sesteritia² (92,000*l.*); and everything is now lower. But my wishes are to be taken into the account; in which I am likely to have no rival besides Otho. Even upon him you will be able to make some impression; and the easier, if you have the assistance of Canus³. O silly gluttony⁴! Let him suppose that I maintain the sternness of a father⁵. You will reply to his letter, if there is anything you wish to say.

LETTER XXXII.

HAVING received a second letter from you to-day, I did not care to leave you with only one in return. Do as you mention in regard to Faberius; for on him depends the whole success of my design. Had not this design been in agitation, (believe me in this, as in everything else,) I should not trouble myself. Therefore, as you do (for nothing can exceed this) urge, insist, accomplish. I should be glad if you would send me both books of Dicaearchus on the Soul, and likewise that on the Descent⁶. I do not find his Tripoliticon, or the letter which he sent to Aristoxenus. I now particularly want those⁷ three books; they would be convenient for the subject⁸; which I have in contemplation. The "Torquatus"⁹ is at Rome: I have desired it may be sent to you. The "Catulus" and "Lucullus"¹⁰: I imagine you have had before; but I have made new introductions to these books, which I wish you to have, containing an eulogium upon each of these persons; and there are some other additions. You have not quite understood what I wrote to you about the ten commissioners; which I suppose was owing to my writing by abbreviations. For I meant to inquire about C. Tuditanus, who I heard from Hortensius had been one of the ten. But in Libo's annals I see that he was prætor in the consulship of P. Popilius and P. Rupilius. Could he then have been a commissioner fourteen years before he was prætor? Unless indeed he became questor extremely late, which I do not think was the case; for I observe that he had no difficulty in taking the curule¹ offices at the regular times. I knew that Poethumius was one of them, whose statue you say you remember at the Isthmus. It is he who was with Lucullus; for whom I have to thank you, as a very proper personage at that congress². You will find out then the others if you can; that I may have a splendid assemblage of characters.

LETTER XXXIII.

STRANGE negligence! Can you suppose that Balbus and Faberius had ever once told me the declaration³ was given in? Moreover, it was by their direction that I sent up on purpose to make my declaration, which they said it was proper to do. It was made by the freed-man Philotimus. I believe you are acquainted with the clerk⁴: but you will write to him, and that without delay. I have sent a letter to Faberius, as you advise; and imagine you will have had some communication with Balbus to-day in the capitol. I have no scruple in regard to Virgilius⁵. I have no reason for it on his own account; and if I should purchase, of what will he have to complain? But you must take care, that, being in Africa, he does not act the same part as Cælius⁶. You will see about the account with Crispinus⁷. But if Plancus thinks of it⁸, there may be some difficulty. You and I are both of us desirous that you should come to me; but this business must not be left. This is indeed good news, that you hope Otho may be gained⁹. Respecting the valuation, as you say, when we have entered upon the negotiation; though his letter only relates to the quantity of land. Conclude with Piso¹⁰ if you can. tioners^c. He will find it in the book which contains the decrees of the senate in the consulate of Cn. Cornelius and L. Mummius. Your conjecture about Fuditanus is very probable; that, as he was at Corinth, (for Hortensius did not mention it inconsiderately,) he was then either questor or military tribune; and I rather suppose this to have been the case. You will be able to ascertain this from Antiochus. Learn also in what year he was questor, or military tribune. If neither agrees, then, whether he was in the number of the lieutenants or of the pages^d; provided he was in that war at all. I was speaking of Varro, and behold the wolf in the fable^e. For he came to me, and at such a time, that I invited him to stay; but did not use so much violence as to tear his coat^f; for I remember that expression of yours; and they were a large company, and I was not prepared. Nevertheless, soon after came C. Capito with T. Carrinas. Their coats I scarcely touched^g; yet they stayed, and it fell out very well. But Capito, by chance, entered upon the subject of enlarging the city^h; that the Tiber was to be brought from the Mulvian bridge at the foot of the Vatican hills; that the Campus Martius was to be built up, and the Vatican plain to be converted into another Campus Martius. "What do you say?" cried I. "I am going to the auction, that, if I can with propriety, I may purchase Scapula's gardens." "Take care how you do it," says he; "for the law will certainly be carried, as it is Caesar's wish." I heard him very patiently, but should be sorry to have it take place. But what say you? You know Capito's diligence in seeking out news. He is not inferior to Camillus. Let me hear about the business of the 15thⁱ; for it is that which brings me up. I had likewise some other affairs, which, however, I can easily transact two or three days later. But I by no means wish you to be harassed with travelling. I also forgive Dionysius. As to what you say about Brutus, I have set him quite at liberty, as far as relates to me; for I wrote to him yesterday to say that I had no occasion for his assistance on the 15th^j.

LETTER XXXIV.

I CAME to Astura the 25th^k, having stopped three hours at Lanuvium to avoid the heat. I should be glad if you could without much trouble get me excused from going to Rome before the 5th^l; which you can do through Egnatius. But, above all, my principal^m concern is, that you should complete the arrangement with Publiusⁿ while I may be considered as absent. Write me word what is said about this. "As if the people cared forsooth^o." In truth, I apprehend not; for it is an old story. But I wanted to fill the page. Why should I say more? as I shall presently be with you, unless you put it off. For I have already written to you on the subject of the gardens.

LETTER XXXV.

O DISGRACEFUL circumstance! Your namesake^p is enlarging the city, which he never saw till within these two years, and which he thinks too little even to hold him. I expect to hear from you upon this subject. You say that you will present the books^q to Varro as soon as he arrives. He has got them then by this time, and all doubt is at an end. Ah! if you could know what risk you run^r! unless my letter has perhaps stopped you. But you had not received it when you wrote last. I am anxious to know therefore how the affair stands.

LETTER XXXVI.

THOUGH what you tell me of Brutus's affection, and your walk together, is nothing new, but the very same that I have often heard before; yet the oftener, the more agreeable. And it is the more gratifying to me, because you take pleasure in it; and the more certain because it comes from you.

LETTER XXXVII.

I SEND you this second letter to-day. Nothing can be more convenient or more suitable than what you mention about Xeno's debt, and the forty sestertia (300*l.*) from Epirus^s. The younger Balbus spake of that business^t to me in the same manner. There is nothing new, but that Hirtius disputed sharply with Quintus^u in my behalf; while he continued everywhere, and especially in company, to utter many calumnies first about me, then about his own father. But nothing of what he said was so plausible, as that we were both exceedingly hostile towards Caesar; that we were not to be trusted; and that I was even to be guarded against. It was quite formidable; but that I knew our king was aware of my having no spirit left. He said too that I was severe towards my son Cicero; but of that as he pleases. I am glad I gave to Lepta's messenger my panegyric on Porcia^w before I received your letter. You will take care, therefore, if you have any regard for me, that if it is sent to Domitius and Brutus, it may be sent in this form^x. You will continue to give me daily information about the gladiators^y, and other subjects that are blown about, as you call it. I should be glad, if you think well of it, that you would call upon Balbus and Offilius about advertising the sale^z. I spoke to Balbus myself, who agreed to it. I imagine Offilius has a written account of all the property. Balbus has also. But Balbus wished for an early day, and at Rome; if Caesar's arrival should be delayed, the day might be put off. But he seems to be just here. Therefore take the whole into consideration; for Vestorius has signified his acquiescence^a.

LETTER XXXVIII.

As I was writing before dawn against the Epicureans^b, by the same lamp and labour^c I scrawled something to you, and sent it before it was light. Afterwards, having slept again, when I got up at sun-rise I received a letter from your sister's son^d, which I send you. The beginning of it is very reproachful; but perhaps "he did it without consideration^e." It runs thus: "I am sorry for everything that can be said discreditably of you." Meaning that many things might be said against me, though he professed not to approve it. Can anything be more foul? But you shall read the rest, and judge for yourself; for I inclose it to you. You mentioned sometime since, that he was struck with the daily and continual commendations of our friend Brutus, such as many persons have told me he bestows upon me. He^f has said something about it to me, and I imagine to you, which you will let me know. What he may have written to his father about me, I cannot tell. But observe how dutifully he speaks of his mother: "In order," says he, "that I might be with you^g as much as possible, I wished to have a house hired for me, and so I told you; but you have not done it, so that we shall be less together. For I cannot bear to see that house; you know why." The reason his father gives, is his aversion to his mother. Now help me, my Atticus, with your advice. "Shall I mount the lofty wall of justice^h?" that is, shall I openly spurn him, and cast him off? "Or shall I use the crooked paths of dissimulation?" For I may add with Pindar—"to say the truth, my mind is divided." The former is more suitable to my disposition; but perhaps the latter to the times. Whatever be your opinion, be assured that mine is the same. I am most apprehensive of his intruding upon me in Tusculanum. It would be easier managed in a greater concourse. Shall I removeⁱ then to Astura? What if Caesar should suddenly arrive? Help me, I beseech you, with your advice. I will do as you determine.

^e I suspect the Greek expression in the original to be taken from some former letter of Atticus, written in extenuation of his nephew's misconduct.

^f Quintus the younger.

^g His father, to whom this letter was written.

LETTER XXXIX.

O VANITY beyond belief!! To tell his father that he must absent himself from home on account of his mother! How dutiful! But his father already relaxes, and says that his son had reason to be angry with him. I will, however, follow your advice; for I see you prefer the crooked^k. I will go to Rome, as you recommend, though against my inclination; for I am deeply engaged in writing. By the same opportunity, you say I shall see Brutus. But were it not for that other reason^l, this circumstance^m would not bring me up: for he does not come from whence I could wishⁿ; nor has he been long absent, or ever written to me. But yet I want to know how his journey has turned out^o. I should be glad if you would send me the books which I before mentioned to you, especially those of Phædrus, entitled Περὶ ἑορτῶν and Ἐκλογαί^p.

LETTER XL.

^m The meeting Brutus.

ⁿ Cicero did not approve of Brutus's paying court to Caesar by going so far to attend him on his return to Rome.

^o One object of his journey seems to have been the obtaining the praetorship through Caesar's favour.

^p Commentators are not agreed about the text, and it is in vain to conjecture what these books might be.

^q This may probably allude to something previously said by Atticus. It appears to be meant of Caesar, who having occasioned the death of so many good citizens, could only find in the regions of the dead any deserving that name.

^r It seems most probable that this may mean some library, or gallery, belonging to Brutus, so called from the temple at Athens, and in which he might, by the advice of Atticus, have placed statues, or pictures, of his ancestors Brutus and Alala, the assertors of their country's liberty, the first against Tarquinus, the second against Q. Melius.

of Ahala and Brutus! But what can he do? I am pleased with what follows^a, that not even he^b, who has been the source of all our atrocities, thinks well of our nephew. I had feared that even Brutus might entertain affection for him: for so he intimated in the letter he wrote in reply to mine. I wish he^c had tasted some of his^d stories. But, as you say, when we meet. Yet what do you advise? that I should go up? or stay? To say the truth, I am both entangled in my books, and unwilling to receive him^e here. I understand his father is gone to-day to meet him at the Acronoman rocks^f. It is surprising how angry he went; so that I was obliged to check him. But I am myself easily changed. Therefore I must hereafter take care how I conduct myself^g. But consider what you think of my going up; and, if it can be clearly seen to-morrow, let me be informed of everything early in the morning^h.

LETTER XLI.

I HAVE sent to Quintus the letter for your sister. Upon his complaining of the quarrel between young Quintus and his mother, (on which account he told his son that he would remove from his house^a.) I mentioned that he had written a very proper letter to his mother, but none to you. He was surprised at the first circumstance; but with regard to you, he said the fault rested with himself, as he had repeatedly written to his son in terms of severity respecting your unkindness towards him. But upon his saying that he relented, I told him (after reading your letter recommending^b dissimulation) that I should not be angry with him. For then came on the mention of Cana^c. And indeed, if that proposal should be adopted, it^d became necessary. But, as you observe, some attention must be paid to our own dignity; and we ought both to be in the same mind, though his offence towards me is the greater and more notorious. But if Brutus brings anything conciliatory, we must not hesitate. When we meet, however: for it is a thing of some moment, and requires caution. To-morrow therefore^e, unless I receive from you some further leave^f of absence.

^a In Atticus's letter.

^b Caesar.

^c Brutus.

^d Quintus' stories against Cicero.

^e Quintus.

^f The text is uncertain, and the place unknown.

^g So I conceive the sentence ought to be completed; meaning that he must be careful how he reproached his nephew, whom he might soon after have occasion to defend, as in the present instance.

^h Early on the day after to-morrow. He wanted to receive from Atticus an early account of everything relating to Caesar's approach, that he might regulate his measures accordingly.

^a See letter 37 of this book.

^b See letter 38 of this book.

^c To be proposed as a match for Quintus.

^d It was necessary to dissemble his displeasure.

^e I shall see you in Rome.

^f Some intimation that I need not so soon go up to Rome. See letter 43 of this book.

LETTER XLII.

HE^a came to me, and was very much dejected; upon which I said, but what makes you so thoughtful? Do you ask, says he, one who has a journey to perform; and a journey to the war, and that a dangerous and a disgraceful one^b? What then obliges you to go? said I. My debts, he replied; and yet I have not even enough to support me on the road. In this place I borrowed something from your eloquence, and held my tongue. But, he went on to say, I am most of all vexed about my uncle. On what account? said I. Because, says he, he is angry with me. Why do you suffer it? I said. (For I chose rather to say so, than, why do you give occasion for it?) I will not suffer it, says he; for I will remove the cause of it. You do rightly, said I; but if it is not troublesome, I should be glad to know what the cause may be. Because, whilst I was deliberating whom I should marry, I did not satisfy my mother, and so did not satisfy him. But at present there is nothing I so much wish^c, and am ready to do what they desire. I hope it will turn out well, said I, and I commend you. But how soon? I am indifferent about the time, said he, since I approve of the thing. But I think, said I, that it should be before you set out; for so you will give satisfaction also to your father. I will do, says he, as you advise. So ended this dialogue. But hark you: you recollect that my birth-day is the 3d of January; you will accordingly be with me. Just as I had finished my letter, see here, Lepidus begs me to come up. I imagine the augurs have nothing to do in the way of consecrating a temple. But let us go^d. I shall therefore see you.

LETTER XLIII.

I SHALL certainly avail myself of this delay of a day; and you have done very kindly to let me know it, and in such a manner as to write yourself immediately from the sports, and to let me get your letter at a time when I did not expect it. I have indeed some business to transact in Rome, but I can do it two days later.

LETTER XLIV.

YOUR letter was most pleasing, however unpleasant the circumstance of the procession^a. But yet it is not unpleasant to know everything, even that affair of Cotta^b. The populace indeed behaved

^a Young Quintus.

^b Against the Parthians, by whom Crassus had been defeated and slain.

^c As to give them satisfaction.

^d Here follow two Greek words, probably corrupted, and rendered little more intelligible by the conjectures of commentators.

^a The procession here spoken of seems to have been that called Circensian, exhibited in the Circus Maximus, where the images of the gods were drawn along with great pomp previously to the exhibition of the games. On this occasion Caesar's image was also drawn next to that of Victory, by an adulatory decree of the senate.

^b It is supposed that Cotta, even at this time, began to speak of making Caesar a king, on pretence of some obscure prophecy that the Parthians could only be conquered by a nobly in giving no applause even to the statue of Victory, on account of its bad neighbour^m. Brutus has been with me, and wished me very much to write something to Cæsar; to which I agreed; but on condition that he would see the processionⁿ. And have you ventured to present the books to Varro^o? I am anxious to know what he may think of them. But when will he read them? I quite approve of your conduct about Attica^p. It is something to have the mind elevated with the sight, as well as with the awe and celebrity, of the ceremony. I should be glad if you would send me Cotta^q. Libo I have with me, and I had Casca before. Brutus has informed me upon the authority of T. Ligarius, that the naming of L. Curfidius in the Ligarian speech is my mistake; but, as they say, an error of memory. I knew that Curfidius was very intimate with the family of Ligarius; but I see that he had died previously. Therefore give instructions to Pharnaces, Anteius, and Salvius^r, to erase that name from all the copies.

LETTER XLV.

LAMIA was with me after you left me; and he brought me a letter he had received from Cæsar, which, though it was dated antecedently to those brought by Diocharēs^s, yet plainly declared his intention of coming before the Roman games^t. At the end of it he desired that Lamia^u would make every preparation for the games, so that he might not hurry up to no purpose. By this letter there seemed to be no doubt of his arriving before that time; and Lamia said that Balbus upon reading that letter was of the same opinion. I find I have some additional holidays^v; but how many, do, if you love me, let me know. You will be able to learn from Bæbius, or from your other neighbour Egnatius. When you exhort me to employ those days in expounding philosophy, you urge one who is already running. But you perceive that I must spend that time with Dolabella. Were I not detained by Torquatus's business^w, I should be able to run down to Puteoli^x, and return in time. Lamia, it seems, had heard from Balbus that there was a large sum of money in the house^y, which ought to be divided as soon as possible; and a great amount of plate, besides the lands; that an auction ought to take place at the earliest time. I wish you would write me word what you think best to be done. For my own part, if I had to choose out of all, I could not easily find anybody more diligent, or more ready, or more friendly towards me, than Vestorius; to whom I have written very particularly, and imagine that you have done the same. This appears to me sufficient. What say you? For the only thing I am afraid of is, that I may seem too negligent. I shall therefore hope to hear from you.

LETTER XLVI.

POLLEX^a told me he would be back by the 13th of August, and accordingly came to me at Lanuvium the 12th. But he is rightly called Pollex, not Index^b. You will learn therefore from himself. I called upon Balbus: for Lepta, who was anxious about the games^c, brought me to him by force, in that Lanuvian villa which he has given up to Lepidus. From him the first thing I heard was this—"A little while ago I received that letter, in which he strongly confirms his intention of returning before the Roman games." I read the letter. There is a great deal about my "Cato"^d, from the repeated perusal of which he says that he is grown more copious; whilst from the reading of Brutus's "Cato"^e he appears to himself eloquent. From him^f I learned the inheritance of Clivius's property. O negligent Vestorius! A free^g inheritance, before witnesses^h, within sixty days. I was afraid it would be necessary to send for himⁱ. Now I must send to desire he will accept by my order. This same Pollex may therefore return^j. I have also had some liberal conversation with Balbus about Clivius's gardens, in which he promised to write to Cæsar immediately. He said that Clivius had charged Titus Hordeonius with a legacy of 50,000 sesterii (400*l*) to Terentia, with the expense of a monument, and several other things; but that there was no charge upon me. Pray, gently reprove Vestorius. What can be more discreditable, than that Plotius the perfumer should so long before have informed Balbus of everything by his slaves; and that he^k should not have informed me even by my own. I am sorry for Cossinius, for I had a great regard for him. If anything should remain after paying my debts and my purchases, I will send it to Quintus; but I apprehend these will oblige me even to contract new ones. I knew nothing about the house at Arpinum.

^a This appears to have been one of Cicero's messengers (see book xi. letter 4); perhaps the same who, in book viii. letter 5, is called Pollux.

^b Pollex in Latin signifies the thumb, index the fore-finger. Index likewise signifies one who gives information. Cicero, by saying he was no index, insinuates that he brought little information.

^c He wanted to have the charge of the games to be celebrated in honour of Cæsar's return.

^d His panegyric upon Cato. Brutus likewise published something on the subject of his uncle Cato.

^e Balbus.

^f A free inheritance might probably mean one unincumbered with conditions.

^g It was to be accepted before witnesses.

^h Vestorius.

ⁱ To Puteoli.

^j Vestorius.

There is no occasion for your accusing Vestorius. For after I had sealed this letter, my messenger arrived in the night, and brought me a letter from him written with great exactness, and likewise a copy of the will.

LETTER XLVII.

As soon as your servant Agamemno touched upon the subject, not of my going up, (though I would have done that also, if it had not been for Torquatus,) but of my writing; I immediately stopped my business, laid aside what I had in hand, and have executed what you desired. I shall be glad to have you made acquainted with the account of my expenses¹ through Pollex. For it would not be creditable to me to leave him² in distress this first year, whatever may have been his conduct. Afterwards I shall regulate matters more carefully. This same Pollex must be sent back to accept³ on my behalf. It was impossible for me to go to Puteoli⁴, as well for the reasons I mentioned to you⁵, as on account of Cæsar's approach. Dolabella writes word that he will come to me the 14th. How irksome is it to be subject to a master⁶! Yesterday evening Lepidus wrote to me from Antium, where he was staying,—for he has the house which I sold. He requests me with great earnestness to attend the senate on the first; that I should greatly oblige both himself and Cæsar. I imagine it is nothing, else Oppius would probably have said something to you,—for Balbus is ill. However, I would rather go up to no purpose, than be away if there should be any real occasion. I should be sorry for it afterwards. Therefore to-day I shall be at Antium; to-morrow before noon I shall reach home⁷. If nothing prevents you, I wish you and Pilia would dine with me on the 31st. I hope you have settled everything with Publius⁸. I shall run back to Tusculanum on the 1st; for I would rather everything should be arranged with them⁹ in my absence. I send you my brother Quintus's letter; not a very kind reply to mine, but yet such as may give you satisfaction, so far as I can judge. You will see.

LETTER XLVIII.

YESTERDAY in the midst of noise¹ I fancy I heard something about your coming to Tusculanum; which I wish, and wish again; yet with your own convenience. Lepta requests that, if his affairs demand it, I will go up,—for Babullius is dead. Cæsar, I believe, inherits one twelfth, though nothing has yet transpired. Lepta succeeds to a third; but he is afraid he may not be allowed to take possession of the inheritance. There is no reason for this; but, however, he is afraid. If therefore he sends for me, I shall hasten up,—else I shall not go before it is necessary. Send back Pollex as soon as you can. I have sent you the panegyric on Porcia¹ corrected; and I have done it the sooner, that if it should happen to be sent to her son Domitius, or to Brutus, it may be sent in this form. If you can conveniently do it, I should be greatly obliged to you to attend to this; and I wish you would send me the panegyric² of M. Varro and of Lollius, especially Lollius's, for the other I have read, yet I want to look at it again,—for there are some parts which I hardly recollect.

LETTER XLIX.

I MUST first send my compliments to Attica¹, who, I suppose, is in the country; then give my best compliments to Pilia likewise. Let me hear of Tigellius, if there is anything new; for, as Gallus Fabius informs me, he brings against me a most unjust charge of having deserted Phamea, after undertaking his cause. This I undertook, not with my good liking, against the young Octaviuses, the sons of Cæsar; but I agreed to it out of regard to Phamea. For, if you remember, he had promised me through you, to assist me in my canvass for the consulship, if there should be any occasion, which I looked upon in the same light as if I had actually made use of him. He came to me, and said that the judge had appointed to hear his cause on the very day when it was necessary for me to attend the council about my friend Sestius by the Pompeian law: for you know the days for those judgments are fixed. I replied that he could not be ignorant of my obligations to Sestius; that if he had taken any other day whatever, I would not fail him. Upon this he went away angry. I believe I told you about it. However, I did not make myself uneasy, nor did I think it necessary to pay attention to the unmerited displeasure of one with whom I was unconnected. I mentioned however to Gallus, when I was lately at Rome, what I had heard, but without naming the younger Balbus². Gallus, as he writes word, had some business of his own. He says that Tigellius suspects me of having injured him from a consciousness of infidelity towards Phamea. I therefore send you this detail, that, if you can, you may learn something about this friend³ of mine. Do not be in any trouble about me⁴: it is well, if anybody be allowed to hate at his own free-will²; it has an appearance of not being entirely slaves. Though indeed, as you perceive, those people³ are rather slaves to me, if paying attention be the test of servitude.

LETTER L.

HAVING been advised in some of your letters to write to Cæsar in a more copious manner, and having lately understood from Balbus in Lanuvium, that he and Oppius had written to Cæsar, and informed him of my having read and greatly commended his book against Cato, I have written a letter to Cæsar, on the subject of this book, to be delivered to Dolabella. But I sent a copy of it to Oppius and Balbus, and have desired them not to let my letter be delivered to Dolabella, unless they approve of the copy. They have replied to me, that they never read anything better, and they ordered the letter to be given to Dolabella. Vestorius has written to me to direct the Brinnian estate⁴ to be surrendered on my part to one Heterius, his servant; in order that he⁵ might himself properly surrender to him⁶ that⁷ at Puteoli. If you approve of this, send that servant to me. I imagine Vestorius will also have written to you. On the subject of Cæsar's coming, I have heard from Oppius and Balbus the same as from you. I am surprised you should yet have had no communication with Tigellius, if it be only to know how much he has received⁸. I am curious to know, though I care not a farthing. You ask what I think about going to meet him⁹: what think you of my going as far as Alsium? I have even written to Muræna about receiving me; but I apprehend he is gone forward with Matius. I shall therefore apply to Sallustius. Just as I had written this last line, Eros has informed me that Muræna made him the kindest answer. I shall therefore lodge with him,—for Silius has no beds: and Dida, I believe, has his house quite full.

LETTER LI.

I forgot to send you a copy of my letter to Cæsar, which was not, as you suspect, because I was ashamed of your seeing it, lest in ridicule I should be called Micillus¹. In faith, I have written no otherwise than to one on a par and equality; for I think well of that book², as I told you in person. I wrote therefore without flattery, and yet so that I think he will read nothing with more pleasure. I am now at length satisfied about Attica: therefore congratulate her again. Tell me all about Tigellius, and as soon as you can,—for I am in great doubt. I can inform you that Quintus comes to-morrow; but whether to me or to you I am uncertain. He wrote me word that he should come to Rome the 25th; but I have sent to invite him¹, though it obliges me to go presently to Rome, that he may not arrive before me.

LETTER LII.

OF THE troublesome guest¹! But I had no reason to repent of it: for it turned out very pleasantly. Upon his arrival at Philippus's on the evening of the second day of the Saturnalia², the house was so filled with soldiers, that there was scarcely space left for Cæsar himself to dine. There were 2000 people. I was indeed disturbed at thinking what would be the case the next day³. Barba Cassius came to my assistance, and set a guard. An encampment was formed in the fields; the house was secured. On the third of the Saturnalia, he remained at Philippus's till one in the afternoon, and did not admit anybody. I imagine he was settling his accounts with Balbus: then he walked on the beach. After two o'clock he went into the bath; then he heard about Mamurra⁴: he never changed countenance: he was anointed, and sat down to table, following an emetic course⁵. So he ate and drank without reserve, and in good-humour; sumptuously indeed, and with due preparation; and not only that, but "with good conversation well digested and seasoned, and, if you ask, cheerfully." His attendants were besides entertained at three tables very plentifully. Nor was anything wanting for the inferior freed-men and slaves; while those of higher condition were elegantly served. In short, I thought myself a man⁶ again. Yet my guest was not one to whom you would say—"Pray come to me in the same manner when you return." Once is enough. There was nothing of importance in the conversation, but a great deal of liberal learning. In short, he was highly pleased, and enjoyed himself. He said he should pass one day at Puteoli, and one at Baie. You have here the account of my hospitality or forced⁷ entertainment, which was hateful to me, I say, not disagreeable. I shall stay here⁸ a little while, then go to Tuscanum. As he passed Dolabella's villa, the whole body of armed men ranged themselves on each side of his horse⁹, which was done nowhere else. This I heard from Nicias.

BOOK XIV.

LETTER I.

I HAVE been to call upon the person^a about whom I spoke to you this morning. He said nothing could be more ruinous; that the state could never be settled. For if he^b, with all his abilities, found no way of doing it, who will now find any? In short, he said that all was ruined. I know not if it be so. But he affirmed, with apparent satisfaction, that in less than twenty days there would be an insurrection in Gaul; that, for his own part, since the 15th of March^c he had conversed with nobody besides Lepidus; in conclusion, that it was impossible things should stop here. O prudent Oppius! who does no less regret Cæsar, while he says nothing that can give offence to any honest man. But enough of this. Whatever new occurs (and I expect a great deal), I beg you will not fail to write. Among other things, whether this is certain about Sextus^d: but above all about our friend Brutus; of whom Cæsar used to say (as I heard from him with whom I have been), that "it is of great importance what he wishes; for whatever he wishes, he wishes strongly." He^e took notice of this, when he^f spoke for Deiotarus at Nice, "that he seemed to speak with great vehemence and freedom." Likewise (for I like to write everything as it occurs) very lately, when I was at his house by desire of Sestius, and sat down till I was called, he^g said: "Can I doubt of my being greatly hated, when M. Cicero is obliged to wait, and cannot get an audience at his own convenience? Yet if anybody is gracious, it is he; nevertheless I doubt not that he hates me bitterly." This he^h told me, and much more of the same kind. But to my purpose. Whatever may happen, not only of great, but also of little moment, you will inform me. On my part I will omit nothing.

LETTER II.

YESTERDAY I received two letters from you. By the first I learned the circumstances of the theatre, and Publius^a; good indications of the concurrence of the populace. The applause, which was given to L. Cassius, has even some pleasantry^b. The other letter is upon the subject of Bald Cape^c, ^j L. Cassius being applauded not for any merit of his own, but because his brother C. Cassius had been one of those concerned in killing Cæsar.

^k There is no doubt of Matius being intended under the name of Madarus, which in Greek signifies bald, the subsequent word φαλακρῶμα signifying a bald head, or naked headland, such as usually protects a harbour. But in this instance it afforded so little hope of tranquillity, that Cicero did not remain there; Matius being evidently hoswhich affords however no safe harbour, as you suppose. For I went on, though not so far as I had intended, being detained a long time in conversation. What I wrote to you, obscurely perhaps, was this; he said that Cæsar had observed to him, upon the occasion of my being kept waiting, when I went to him at Sestius's request: "Can I now be so foolish as to suppose this easy man will be friendly to me, after he has been kept so long waiting for my convenience?" You have then a "bald cape" very unfriendly to tranquillity; that is, to Brutus. I am going to-day to Tusculanum, to-morrow to Lanuvium; thence I mean to proceed to Astura. Everything is ready for Pilia's reception^a; but I want likewise to see Attica, though I forgive you^b. My compliments to both of them.

LETTER III.

YOUR letter is still peaceful. I wish this may last; for Matius said it was impossible. And my workmen, mark you, who went to purchase corn, returned empty-handed, and brought a strong report from Rome that all the corn was taken to Antonius's house. This is certainly a false alarm, or you would have written to inform me. Balbus's freed-man Corumbus has not yet been here. The name is familiar to me; for he is said to be a clever architect. You seem to have been employed to countersign^a not without reason; for so these people would have us think^b. I do not know why they should not feel it also in their heart. But what are these things to me? However, scent out Antonius's real disposition. I suspect him rather of solicitude about his table, than of designing any mischief. If you have anything of importance, let me know it; or if not, tell me the indications of popular feeling, and the sayings of the actors^c. Compliments to Pilia and Attica.

LETTER IV.

WHAT news do you suppose I can have at Lanuvium? But I imagine that you there^a must every day receive some fresh intelligence. The times are pregnant with business. For when Matius^b is so indisposed to peace, what think you of others? I am grieved indeed that (what never till to Brutus, from whose cause alone tranquillity could be expected.

happened in any other state) together with liberty the republic should not have been restored. What is talked of, and threatened, is dreadful. I am afraid also of hostilities in Gaul, and what Sextus¹ may attempt. But whatever happens, this 15th of March is a consolation. Our heroes², as far as lay in them, have acted gloriously and magnificently. What remains to be done, requires supplies and forces, of which we have none. I write this, that if there is anything new, (for every day I expect something), you may immediately let me know it; and if there is nothing new, yet that, according to custom, our correspondence may suffer no interruption. I will take care it shall not on my part.

LETTER V.

HAVING used abstinence before you were seriously indisposed, I hope that all is now as I could wish; yet I should be glad to know how you do. It is a good sign, that Calpurnius³ is uneasy at being suspected by Brutus. But this is no good sign, that the legions are coming with their ensigns from Gaul. What do you think of those which have been in Spain? Will they not make the same demands? What of those which Annius took over? I should have said Caninius, but it was a slip of the memory. There will be great confusion excited by this gamester⁴. For that conspiracy of Cæsar's freed-men might easily be put down, if Antonius were right-minded. Mine was a foolish scrupulousness in declining to get an honorary legation⁵ before the adjournment, that I might not seem to desert this swell of affairs, from which, if it were possible for me to remedy it, I certainly ought not to withhold my services. But you see the magistrates, if indeed they deserve the name, you see however the minions of the tyrant in authority; you see his veteran troops at our side⁶; all which are unstable⁷ things; while they⁸, who ought not only to be protected, but exalted, by the guards of the whole world, are rewarded neither with praise nor love, but confined within their own walls⁹. Yet, after all, it is they that are happy: the state that is wretched. But I should be glad to know what effect the approach of Octavius¹⁰ produces; whether people flock to him; whether there is any apprehension of usurpation. I do not think it; but yet, whatever happens, I wish to know it. I write this to you on the 12th, setting out from Astura.

¹⁰ The conspirators against Cæsar.

¹¹ They withdrew from the public ferment excited by Cæsar's death.

¹² Better known afterwards by the name of Augustus.

LETTER VI.

I RECEIVED your letter on the 12th at Fundi, while I was at dinner. In the first place therefore I was glad to hear that you were better; then that you made a better report of public affairs; for I did not like that approach of the troops. About Octavius I am very indifferent. I am curious to hear something of Marius¹, whom I supposed to have been put death by Cæsar. Antonius's interview with our heroes² passed off very well for the occasion. Hitherto, however, nothing gives me pleasure besides the 15th of March. Here at Fundi, where I am with my friend Ligur, I am distracted at seeing Sextilius's farm in the possession of that rascal Curtilius; and what I say of him, I say of the whole tribe. For what can be more sad, than to look upon the very things which made us hate him³? Are we also to have for two years the consuls and tribunes of the people, which he chose? I am quite at a loss to know what part I can take in public affairs. Nothing was ever so inconsistent, as that the destroyers of the tyrant should be praised to the skies, while the acts of the tyrant are defended. But you see the consuls; you see the other magistrates (if they deserve the name); you see the want of energy in the good. In the country towns the people are exulting with joy. It cannot be told how much they are delighted, how they flock about me, how eager they are to hear every word relating to that affair.⁴ Yet in all this time no decrees are passed. For such is the state of our government, that we are afraid of the very people we have defeated. I write this during my desert. I will write more fully on public affairs another time. Let me on your part hear how you do, and what is going forward.

LETTER VII.

ON the 14th I saw Paullus in Caleta, who informed me about Marius, and mentioned some other things relating to the republic, which were indeed very sad. There has been nothing from you, for none of my people have arrived. But I hear that our friend Brutus was seen near Lanuvium. Where does he intend to fix himself? For while I wish to be acquainted with everything else, so particularly with what concerns him. I write this the 15th, on the point of leaving Formianum, that from thence in another day I may reach Puteolanum. I have received from Cicero a letter smacking of the ancient style, and of considerable length. The rest may possibly be feigned; but the style of his letter shows that he has acquired some learning. Now I earnestly beg you to take care, as I lately mentioned to you, that he may not be left in want of anything. This concerns my credit and dignity, as well as my duty; and I understand that you are entirely of the same opinion. If then there is an opportunity, I think of going into Greece in the month of July. I hope everything may be more favourable. But the times being such that it is impossible to say certainly what may be proper for me, what allowable, what expedient; pray take care that I may support him honourably and handsomely. You will take into your consideration, as usual, this, and whatever else concerns me; and you will write to me all that is interesting, or, if there is nothing, what comes into your head.

LETTER VIII.

WHEN you wrote, you supposed me to be already in one of my houses on the coast; and I received your letter on the 16th at the little cottage at Sinuessæ^b. About Marius it is quite right, though I must needs grieve for the grandson^c of L. Crassus. I rejoice also that our friend Brutus is so well satisfied with Antonius^d. For as to what you say of Junia's^e having brought a letter written in a temperate and friendly manner; Paullus^f gave me one that he had received from his brother; at the conclusion of which he mentions that a plot had been formed against him, of which he had certain information. I did not like this, much less did he. I am not sorry for the queen's^g flight; but I want you to inform me what is become of Clodia^h. You will take care about the Byzantians, as about everything else, and will send for Pelops to come to you. As soon as I have seen into the business of Balizⁱ, and that assemblage, about whom you want to be informed, I will write, as you desire, that you may know everything. I am anxiously expecting what the Gauls, what the Spaniards, what Sextus will do. This you will tell me, who tell me everything. I am glad that the reason of your silence was nothing but a slight indisposition; for I seem, as I read your letters, to feel a temporary ease. Always write to me everything that relates to Brutus, where he is, and what are his intentions. I hope he may now safely walk alone all over the city. But yet I should like to know!

^b Sinuessæ is on the sea-coast, whither Atticus's letter had been sent. It appears, from book xvi. letter 10, that Cicero had a house there.

^c This pretender had been put to death by Antonius. Had he been the person whose name he assumed, he would have been grandson to L. Crassus. See book xii. letter 50.

^d Brutus's agreement with Antonius was likely to lead to peace.

^e This Junia was sister to Brutus, and wife to M. Lepidus, who had the government of Transalpine Gaul. The letter must probably have been from Lepidus, the friend of Cæsar, to Brutus. The good understanding of the opposite parties apparent from this letter, would be destroyed by plots, or the suspicion of plots, such as is afterwards mentioned.

^f L. Æmilius Paullus, brother to Lepidus.

^g Cleopatra, who had followed Cæsar to Rome, and now fled upon the event of his assassination.

^h To what this alludes, or the following mention of the Byzantians, is not known.

ⁱ When Cicero speaks of "the business" of Baliz, he may be supposed to mean the conversation and idle talk, Baliz being notorious for idleness. And this sense receives confirmation from the word chorus, which I have rendered "assemblage," but which in the original means properly "a troop of dancers or singers." The expressions may probably be borrowed from Atticus, who seems often to have indulged in a little good-humoured bantering, seasoned also with terms newly invented or newly applied. [See book iv. letter 8.] It is to this that Cicero alludes [see letter 14 of this book] when he says joca tua plena facetiarum. See letter 5 of this book.

LETTER IX.

I HAVE learned a great deal about the republic from your letters, several of which I received at the same time by Vestorius's freed-man. To your questions I shall reply briefly. In the first place, I am greatly delighted with the Cluvian inheritance^a; but as to what you ask, why I sent for Chrysippus^b; I had two cottages in ruins, and the rest were so crazy, that not only the lodgers, but the very rats had left them. Some people would call this a calamity; for my part, I do not think it even a disadvantage. O Socrates, and ye of the Socratic school^c, I shall never be sufficiently thankful to you. Ye immortal gods! how totally do I disregard such things. But, however, I have got such a plan for building, by the recommendation and assistance of Vestorius, that this loss will be a real gain to me. There is a great concourse here; and, as I am told, it will be still greater. Two, indeed, are the pretended^d consuls elect. O gracious gods! The tyranny survives, though the tyrant is dead. We rejoice in the death of the victim, whose acts we defend. How severely, therefore, does M. Curtius accuse us, as if it were a disgrace to live! And not without reason. For it had been better to die a thousand times than to suffer such a state of things, which seems likely even to be permanent. Balbus also is here, and is much with me. He had received a letter from Vetus^e, dated the 31st of December, stating that at the time he was besieging Cæcilius^f, and had almost taken him, Pacorus the Parthian came up with a large army, by which means Cæcilius had been snatched from him, and he had lost many of his men; in which affair he accuses Volcatius. Thus a war in that quarter appears imminent. But let Dolabella and Nicias^g see to this. At the same time Balbus gave me more favourable accounts of Gaul. He had a letter twenty days after its date, saying that the Germani, and those nations, upon hearing about Cæsar, had sent deputies to Aurelius, who was left in the command by Hirtius, professing their submission to such orders as they should receive. In short, everything wore the appearance of peace, contrary to what Calpurnius^h had said.

LETTER X.

Is it so, then? Has my and your Brutus found this fruit of his exertion, that he should be shut up in Lanuvium? That Trebonius should proceed to his province through by-ways? That all the acts, writings, sayings, promises, thoughts of Cæsar, should have greater force than if he were himself alive? Do you remember how I demanded, on that very first capitoline^a day, that the senate should be summoned by the prætors¹ into the capitol! Ye immortal gods! What operations might then have been effected; while all good, or tolerably good people were exulting; and the rogues were confounded? You lay the blame on the 18th of March². But what could have been done then? We were already ruined. Do you remember exclaiming that the cause was ruined, if he should be buried with funeral honours? Yet he was burned in the public forum, and extolled to excite pity; and slaves and beggars were sent with torches against our houses. What followed? That they dared to say, "Do you oppose the nod of Cæsar?" These, and other things of the same kind, I am unable to bear; therefore I think of changing my country for another. But has your windy colic entirely left you? As far as I could judge by your letters, it seemed to be so. I come back to the Tebassi³, the Scævas, the Frangos. Do you imagine that they expect to hold their possessions, while our authority still subsists? For they gave us credit for more valour than they have found. Will these, forsooth, be lovers of peace, and not rather authors of plunder? But what I said to you about Curtilius⁴ and the Sextilian estate, I say about Censorinus, about Messala, about Plancus, about Postumius, about the whole set. It were better to have died when he⁵ died (which I wish⁶ had happened), than to witness these things. Octavius arrived in Naples the 18th⁷. There Balbus saw him the following morning, and the same day came to me in Cumano, and said that he⁸ was going to enter upon his inheritance⁹. But, as you say, he must have a great contest-radical^c with Antonius. Your Buthrotian^d affair is, as it ought and shall be, an object of my care. You ask if the Cluvian inheritance^e has already produced a hundred sestertia (800*l.*). It seems to approach to this; but in the first year I have cleared eighty (640*l.*). Quintus the father has written to me in vexation about his son, principally owing to the fondness he now shows to his mother, towards whom he was before so undeservedly hostile^f. He has sent me some flaming letters against him. What he is doing, if you know, and have not yet left Rome, I should be glad if you would inform me; and indeed, if there is anything else. I am infinitely delighted with your letters.

LETTER XI.

THE day before yesterday I sent you a longer letter. I shall now reply to the contents of your last. I should in truth be very glad to let Brutus occupy Astura^g. You speak of the intemperance of those people: did you expect it to be otherwise? For my part, I look for yet greater things. When I read the harangue about "so great a man," about so "distinguished a citizen," I am unable to bear it. Though these things may now make one smile, yet remember, the custom of pernicious harangues is so cherished, that those our gods, not heroes, will live indeed in eternal glory, but not without envy, not even without danger. Yet they have a great consolation in the consciousness of the noblest and most famous deed. But what consolation is left for us, who, when our king is killed, are yet not free? But let fortune see to this, since reason does not rule. I am pleased with what you tell me of Cicero. I wish all may go on well. The care you take to supply him amply for his use and ornament is very grateful to me, and I beg you to continue it. Respecting the Buthrotians you judge very rightly, and I do not forget that concern. I will also undertake all legal actions which I perceive daily to become easier. With regard to the Cluvian inheritance (since the interest you take in my affairs exceeds even my own), the rents amount to a hundred (800*l.*). The downfall^h has not lessened the property; I do not know if it may not have improved it. I have with me here Balbus, Hirtius, and Pansa. Octavius has lately arrived at the neighbouring house of Philippus. He is entirely devoted to me. Lentulus Spinther is coming to me to-day, and goes away to-morrow morning.

LETTER XII.

O MY Atticus, I fear this 15th of March may be productive of no other issue than a transitory joy, followed by the penalty of odium and grief. What is it that I hear from thenceⁱ? What do I witness here^j? A noble act indeed, but fruitless! You know how much I am attached to the people of Sicily, and how honourable I esteem that patronage. Cæsar conferred upon them many benefits, to which I did not object, though their admission to the rights of Latium was too much. However, let that pass. But see now, Antonius, in consideration of a large sum of money, has promulgated a law, said to have been proposed by the dictator in the comitia, by which the Sicilians are made Roman citizens, of which there was never any mention during his life. Nay, is not the case the same with my friend Deiotarus¹? He is worthy indeed of any kingdom; but not through the influence of Fulvia¹. There are six hundred things of the same kind. But I come back to my purpose. In a cause so clear, so well attested, and so just, as that of Buthrotum², shall we obtain no satisfaction? We may the more expect it, the more he³ thus dispenses. Octavius conducts himself here in a manner very respectful and friendly towards me. His own people saluted him as Cæsar⁴; but Philippus⁵ did not, therefore neither did I. I do not think it possible for him to be a good citizen, so many people are about him, who threaten the death of our friends. They⁶ say these things are not to be borne. What think you, when this boy⁷ shall come to Rome, where our liberators cannot be in safety? Famous indeed they will always be, and happy too in the consciousness of what they have achieved. But we, unless I deceive myself, shall lie in disgrace. I wish, therefore, to get away, where "I may hear nothing of the Pelopidæ⁸," as the poet says. I do not like even these consuls elect, who have, however, forced me to declaim⁹; so that I am not permitted to be at rest even at this watering-place. This is owing to my too great complaisance. Formerly it was almost necessary; but now, whatever be the state of things, the case is altered. For a good while past I have had nothing to write to you; yet I write, not because I can afford you any pleasure by this letter, but that I may elicit yours. Do you, if there is anything about other matters, but especially whatever occurs relative to Brutus, let me know it. I write this on the 22d¹⁰, while I am at table at Vestorius's house, a man unused to argument, but sufficiently versed in arithmetic¹¹.

LETTER XIII.

YOUR letter of the 19th was delivered to me on the seventh day after. You ask, and even suppose that I do not myself know, whether I am most pleased with the hills and prospect, or with the walks on the level beach¹². And indeed, as you say, the beauty of both is such, that I doubt which is to be preferred. But "we have other cares than those of entertainments, and see with dread a prodigious mischief gathering, and stand in doubt whether we shall be saved, or perish¹³." For though you send me great and pleasing intelligence of D. Brutus¹⁴ having joined his troops, in whom my best hopes reside; yet, if a civil war breaks out, as it certainly will if Sextus remains in arms, which I am confident he will, what part I ought to take I know not. For it will not now be allowable, as it was in Cæsar's war, to move neither to one side nor the other. But whomsoever this set of scoundrels supposes to have been pleased with Cæsar's death (and we have all most openly showed our joy), him they will hold to be in the number of their enemies. And this consideration leads to a most extensive slaughter. It remains for me, then, to join the army of Sextus¹⁵, or perhaps of Brutus. An odious measure, at once foreign from our age, and exposed to the uncertain issue of war. So that we may in some measure say to each other, "My child, to you are not granted warlike operations; do you rather employ yourself in the lovely works of speech¹⁶." But this must be left to fortune, which in such circumstances is of more avail than reason. Let us, however, see to that, which ought to be in our own power; that whatever happens we may bear it with fortitude and self-possession, and may remember that it is the condition of humanity: and let us still derive great consolation from literature, and not a little also from the 15th of March. Take now upon yourself the consideration of what constitutes my present solicitude, so many things occur to my mind both ways. I am going, as I had arranged, with a nominal appointment¹⁷ to Greece. I may thus in some measure escape the danger of the impending conflict, but am likely to incur blame for deserting the republic at so difficult a crisis. Should I remain, I foresee that I must be exposed to great risk; but I conceive it may happen that I may be able to be of use to the republic. The following considerations are of a private nature; that I think it may be very advantageous for the confirmation of my son, that I should go thither; nor indeed had I any other object in view at the time when I determined to get from Cæsar an honorary lieutenantancy. You will take this whole business, therefore, into your consideration, as you use to do where you think me to be concerned. I come now to your letter, in which you say it is rumoured that I am going to sell the property which I have at the lake¹⁸; and to convey to Quintus that little place at an extravagant price, that the rich Aquillia, as young Quintus told you, may be introduced there¹⁹. But I have no thought of selling it, unless I should find something which I like better; and Quintus has, at this time, no wish to purchase; for he has enough to do in the repayment of his wife's dower^d, in which he is under great obligations to Egnatius. And as for taking another wife, he is so far from it, that he declares nothing is more delightful than a single bed. But enough of this. I revert to the wretched, or rather the lost republic. M. Antonius has written to me about the restoration of Sextus Clodius^e; how honourably, as far as relates to me, you will see by his own letter, of which I send you a copy; how profligately, how basely, how mischievously (so that I sometimes almost wish for Cæsar again), you will easily believe. For things which Cæsar would never either have done or suffered, are now brought forward from his forged instructions. I have treated Antonius with all civility; for having once persuaded himself that he was at liberty to do what he chose, he would not the less have done it for my disapprobation. Therefore I send you likewise a copy of my answer.

Antonius Consul to Cicero.

It has happened from my occupations, and your sudden departure, that I have been prevented from treating with you personally upon the following business; and in consequence am apprehensive that my absence may lessen the weight I might have with you. But if your goodness corresponds with the opinion I have always entertained of you, I shall sincerely rejoice. I begged of Cæsar to restore Sex. Clodius; and I gained my suit. It was my intention, even then, to use his kindness only on the condition of your acceding to it; which makes me the more earnest that I may now be permitted to do it with your consent. But if you show yourself unmoved by his miserable and ruined fortune, I shall not contend against you, however I may seem bound to support Cæsar's will. Yet in truth, if you are disposed to regard me with humanity, with prudence and charity, you will easily be persuaded; and will be glad that P. Clodius^f, a youth of the fairest hopes, should think that, when it was in your power, you did not persecute his father's friends. Let it, I entreat you, appear that you engaged in hostility with his father for the republic's sake; and you will not despise this family. For we more honourably, and more readily, lay aside the quarrels which have been taken up in the name of the republic, than those of private pique. Suffer me then to instil into this youth, even now, these sentiments, and to teach his tender mind that quarrels are not to be transmitted to posterity. Though I know well that your fortune, Cicero, is exempt from all danger; yet I apprehend you would rather pass a tranquil and honourable old age, than one of vexation. Lastly, I ask this favour of you by my own right, having done everything in my power for your sake. Should I not obtain your consent, so far as I am concerned, I shall not give this boon to Clodius; that you may understand how great your authority is with me, and may for that reason be the more easily conciliated.

Cicero to Antonius, Consul.

WHAT you negotiate with me by letter, I should for one reason only have wished to negotiate in person; that you might have perceived not by my words alone, but also by my countenance, and eyes, and forehead, as they say, the affection I bear you. For having always loved you, as indeed I was constrained to do, first by your attention, afterwards also by the favours I received, so in these times the republic has attached me to you in such a manner, that I hold nobody dearer; and the letter you have written full of affection and consideration, makes me feel not that I am doing a kindness to you, but receiving one from you; while in your request you refuse to serve my enemy, though your own relation, against my consent; when you have it in your power to do so without any difficulty. But, my Antonius, I not only concede this to you; but such are the expressions you use, that I consider myself most liberally and honourably treated. And though in any case I should think it right freely to grant this to you, I am glad to do it also in consideration of my own feelings and disposition. For I never entertained any bitterness, nor anything that partakes of austereness or severity, beyond what the necessity of the republic demanded. To which I may add, that against Clodius^g himself I never showed any signs of anger; and have always made it a rule, not to persecute an enemy's friends, especially those without power; and not to deprive ourselves of the protection they afforded. Respecting young Clodius, I consider it to be your business to imbue his tender mind, as you say, with these sentiments, that he may not suppose any hostility to remain between our families. In my contentions with P. Clodius I supported the public cause; he his own. The republic has passed its judgment upon our struggles. If he were living, I should now have no quarrel remaining with him. Therefore, since you ask this of me in such a manner, that, notwithstanding your power, you refuse to make use of it without my consent, pray give this also to the young man, if you think fit; not that my age has any danger to apprehend from his youth; or that my dignity has to fear any opposition; but that you and I may be mutually united together more than we have hitherto been. For owing to the intervention of these hostilities, your heart has been more open to me, than your house. But enough of this. I have only to say, that I shall always, without hesitation, and with the greatest zeal, do whatever I think will please you, or contribute to your advantage; of which I beg you to be thoroughly persuaded.

LETTER XIV.

REPEAT again those same words to me^h. Has our young Quintus worn a chaplet in the publicⁱ ^g Sextus Clodius, for whom Antonius had written to him.

ⁱ The Parilia were celebrated the 21st of April; but Cæsar having received the news of a victory gained in Spain on the eve of this annual festival, appointed additional games to be observed ever after in memory of that event. Young Quintus wore a chaplet on this occasion to show his attachment to Cæsar.

games? Was he the only one? though you add Læmia, which I am surprised at; but I wish to know who there were besides. I am quite sure however there could be nobody who was not a bad citizen. Yet let me hear the particulars. It happened that I had despatched to you my letter of the 26th written at considerable length, about three hours before I received yours full of important matter. I need not tell you how heartily I laughed at your pleasantry and wit on the Vestorine¹ heresy, and the Puteolan custom of the Pherios. But let us turn to what more immediately concerns the public. You defend the party of Brutus and Cassius, as if I reproached them, whom I cannot sufficiently praise. But I summed up the faults of the times, not of the men. For after the tyrant has been removed, I see the tyranny continue. So that what he¹ would not have done, is now done; as in the case of Clodius; respecting whom I am confident that he not only would not have done it, but would not even have suffered it. Rufio Vestorianus² will follow, (who was never written Victor³), and others. Who will not? We could not bear to be the slaves of the man himself; yet we yield obedience to his memorandums. For on the 18th of March⁴ who could absent himself from the senate? But suppose that this might in some manner have been possible; yet, when we had assembled, could we freely deliver our opinions? Was it not necessary by all means to support the veteran soldiers⁵, who were present, and armed, while we had nothing to protect us? How little I was pleased with that session⁶ in the capitol, you are witness. What then? Was that the fault of the Brutuses⁷? By no means indeed of those Brutuses; but of other Brutuses⁸, who think themselves cautious and prudent; who were satisfied with feeling a secret joy; while some even expressed their congratulations; but none remained firm. But let us omit what is past; let us support these people with every care and protection; and, as you teach us, let us be content to think ourselves happy in the 15th of March; which to our friends indeed, those more than mortal men, has given an access to heaven; but has not given freedom to the Roman people. Recollect your own prediction. Do you not remember how you exclaimed that everything was lost, if he should have a public funeral? You said it wisely; and you see what has flowed from that circumstance. As to what you mention, that Antonius was to bring forward the subject of the provinces on the first of June, of which he was himself to have the two Gauls, with extension of the ordinary time in both: will it be allowed to vote freely? If it is, I shall rejoice at the recovery of our liberty; if not, what do I get by this change of masters, besides the pleasure with which my eyes beheld the just fall of the tyrant? You say that the temple of Ops¹ has been plundered; which I foresaw at that time. Verily we have been set free by excellent men, and yet are not free. So the praise is theirs, the blame our own. And do you exhort me to write history? To collect together the wicked acts of these people, by whom we are even now besieged? Can I avoid commending those same persons, who have employed you to countersign²? Not that the paltry interest weighs with me; but it is hard to visit with reproach people, whoever they are, that are kindly disposed. But about all my designs, as you mention, I think I shall be able to decide more certainly on the 1st of June, on which day I shall be in Rome, and will use my utmost endeavours, with the help of your authority and influence, and the perfect justice of the cause, that a decree of the senate may be obtained in the case of the Buthrotians, such as you describe. What you bid me consider, I will consider; though in my last letter I had referred the consideration to you. But you are for restoring to your neighbours³, the Marsilians, their property; as if the republic were already re-established. It may perhaps be possible to do this by arms, in which what strength we possess I know not; by authority it is impossible.⁴

LETTER XV.

THE short letter, which you afterwards¹ wrote, was indeed very pleasing to me, about Brutus's letter to Antonius, and the other to you. Things wear a better appearance than they have hitherto done. But I must consider where I am, and which way I should even now proceed². My charming Dolabella! For I now call him mine; before, believe me, I had some doubt. This is an affair of deep contemplation. From the Tarpeian rock³! On the cross! Throwing down the pillar! Con-

¹ In which Caesar had collected a large sum of money for the prosecution of the Parthian war.

² See letter 3 of this book.

⁵ It having been his intention to pass over to Greece See letter 13 of this book.

tracting for the new paving of the ground! In short, it is quite heroic. He seems to have put an end to that affectation of regret^a, which was already making daily progress, and which I feared, had it continued, would have been dangerous to our deliverers. I now entirely concur with your letter, and hope for better things; though I cannot bear those persons, who, while they pretend to be friends to peace, support his^a wicked acts. But all cannot be done at once. Things are beginning to go better than I had expected. I shall not, however, go abroad, till you think I can do it with propriety. I will certainly nowhere be wanting to my Brutus. Even if there were no friendship between us, I would do it in acknowledgment of his great and distinguished virtue. I give up to Pilia my whole house^b, and all that it contains, being myself on my way to Pompeianum this 1st of May. I wish you would persuade Brutus to occupy my house at Astur^c.

LETTER XVI.

I SEND this letter the 3d of May on the point of embarking from the Cluvian gardens in a row-boat, after having put our dear Pilia in possession of my house on the Lucrine lake, with the servants and purveyors. The same day I threaten our friend Pætus's potted cheese^d, and proceed in a few days to Pompeianum; whence I shall afterwards return by sea to these royal^e domains of Puteoli and Cumæ. O places greatly to be desired in all other respects! but from the number of troublesome visitors almost to be shunned. But to come to the point; how noble is this conduct of my Dolabella! What matter it affords for contemplation! For my part, I do not cease to praise and to encourage him. You do well to inform me in all your letters, what you think of the thing itself, and what of the man. Our friend Brutus, I suppose, might now wear even a golden crown in the middle of the forum. For who would dare to insult him, with a cross, or the Tarpeian rock^f before his eyes? Especially amidst such great applause and approbation of the lowest people. Now, my Atticus, resolve me of my doubts. I should like, when I have fully satisfied Brutus, to make an excursion into Greece. It is of great moment to Cicero, or rather to me, or I may say to both of us, that I should look upon him in his studies. For Leonidas's letter, which you sent me, affords me no great satisfaction. I shall never be content with commendations such as these; "as things are at present." It is the testimony of one who feels no confidence, but rather mistrust. I had desired Herodes to write to me in detail; but I have hitherto heard nothing from him. I fear he may have had nothing which he thought would give me pleasure to hear. I am much obliged to you for having written to Xeno; for my duty and reputation, are both concerned in his having no want unsupplied. I hear that Flamæus Flaminius is in Rome. I have written to him to say that I had desired you to speak with him about the business of Montanus^g; and I shall be glad if you will take care that my letter is delivered to him; and will yourself, at your convenience, have some conversation with him. I conceive if the man has any sense of shame, he will provide against the possibility of any expense being incurred on his account. You have acted very kindly towards me in letting me know that Attica was well, before I knew of her indisposition.

LETTER XVII.

I CAME to Pompeianum the 3d of May, having, the day preceding, as I before wrote you word, established Pilia in Cumanum. There, whilst I was at dinner, your letter was delivered to me, which you had given to your freed-man Demetrius, the 30th of last month. In this are contained many things prudently done, yet such that, as you yourself observe, every design appears subject to the control of fortune. Upon these subjects, therefore, we can only speak as occasion offers, and when we are together. Respecting the affair of Buthrotum, I wish I may have an opportunity of seeing Antoninus, which will be a great step. But it is not expected that he will deviate from the Capuan road, whither I fear he is gone to the great prejudice of the republic^h. L. Caesarⁱ, whom I saw yesterday at Naples very far from well, was of the same opinion. This business must therefore be entered upon, and completed on the 1st of June^j. But enough of this. Young Quintus has written a most bitter letter to his father, who received it upon our arrival at Pompeianum. The substance of it was that he would not tolerate Aquillia as his step-mother. That however might perhaps be borne. But what think you of this? That from Caesar he had received everything; nothing from his father; and for what was to come he looked to Antonius. How lost to all sense of honour! But I will think what can be done. I have written letters to our friend Brutus, to Cassius, and to Dolabella; of which I send you copies; not with a view to deliberate about sending them, for I am clearly of opinion they should be sent; but because I doubt not that you will agree with me. I beg you, my Atticus, to supply my son with what you think right, and to allow me to lay this burden upon you. I am very thankful for what you have hitherto done. That unpublished work of mine^k has not yet been polished, as I designed. What you wish to have interwoven in it requires another separate volume. But, believe me, I think there was less danger in speaking against those wicked practices during the life of the tyrant than since his death. For he somehow bore with me surprisingly. Now, Cicero to his Dolabella, Consul.

THOUGH I am satisfied, my Dolabella, with the glory you have gained, and derive abundantly great joy and delight from it; yet I cannot help acknowledging that my pleasure is enhanced by the common opinion which supposes me to have a share in your praises. I have seen nobody—and I meet with numbers every day; for there are a great many excellent men who come into these parts* on account of their health, besides many of my friends from the neighbouring towns; all of whom, while they extol you to the skies with the loudest praises, presently return the greatest thanks to me. For they say they cannot doubt but that it is in consequence of my instructions and advice that you show yourself so excellent a citizen, and so distinguished a consul. To whom, though I might most truly reply, that what you do, you do from your own judgment and inclination, and that you need nobody's advice; yet I neither quite assent, lest I should seem to lessen your praise, if it were all owing to my counsels; neither do I strongly deny it; for, you know, I am more than enough covetous of glory. Besides, it is not unbecoming your dignity (what was thought honourable to Agamemnon himself, the king of kings) to have some Nestor in forming your counsels; while to me it is most glorious that you, a young consul, should flourish in praises as the pupil of my institution. L. Cæsar, when I saw him sick at Naples, though he was suffering from pains all over his body, yet, almost before he saluted me, "O my Cicero," said he, "I congratulate you upon having such influence with Dolabella; which, if I had with my sister's son", we might already be safe. Congratulate also and thank your Dolabella, who, since your own consulship, is the only one whom I can truly call a consul." He went on to say a great deal about the case, and the part you had taken; and declared that nothing was ever done more noble, nothing more famous, nothing more salutary to the republic: and in this all with one voice agree. I must beg you then to let me enter upon this false inheritance, as it were, of another's glory, and in some measure to become a partner in your praises. But in truth, my Dolabella, (for hitherto I have been joking,) I would sooner transfer to you all my own praises, if indeed I have any, than draw off any part from yours. For having always had that affection for you, of which you are the best judge; yet with these actions I am so wonderfully inflamed, that no affection ever was stronger. For nothing, believe me, is more becoming, nothing more beautiful, nothing more lovely, than virtue. I have always, as you know, loved M. Brutus for his great abilities, his sweet disposition, his distinguished probity and firmness; yet the 15th of March produced such an accession to my love, that I wondered there should have been any room for the increase of what seemed already at the full. Who would have thought that any addition could have been made to the love I bare you? Yet such is the addition, that I seem to myself now at length to love, before only to have liked. Why, then, should I exhort you to regard your own dignity and glory? Should I propose to you the examples of eminent men, as they do who use exhortations? I have nobody to propose more eminent than yourself. It is yourself you must imitate; with yourself you must contend. It is not allowable for you now, after such noble deeds, not to be like yourself. Which being the case, exhortation is needless. We ought rather to congratulate you. For that has happened to you which has happened I believe to nobody else, that the utmost severity of punishment has not only been inflicted without exciting ill-will, but has even been popular; and, while it has gratified every good man, it has likewise pleased every one of the lowest class. If this were the effect of chance, I would congratulate your good fortune; but it is the effect of your own greatness of mind, your understanding, and judgment. For I have read your speech, than which nothing can be more prudent. So step by step have you gone back to the cause of what was done, and again returned from it; that the case itself, by the confession of everybody, was ripe for your animadversion. You have saved therefore both the city from danger, and the state from fear; and have conferred a benefit not merely temporary, but of lasting example. You ought, consequently, to understand that the republic reposes on you; and that those persons, from whom it has derived a commencement of liberty, are by you not only to be protected, but rewarded with honours. But on these matters I hope very soon to say more in person. Since it is you who preserve the republic and us, take especial care, my Dolabella, of our own safety.

LETTER XVIII.

You repeatedly attack me because I appear too extravagantly to extol this action of Dolabella's. But while I certainly approve of what has been done, I have been led by more than one of your letters to this high strain of commendation. Dolabella, however, has wholly forfeited your opinion by the same cause, which has likewise made me very much his enemy. The modest man! He ought to have paid the lat of Antonius, and he has not paid yet; though he was set free from an enormous debt by the hand of Faberius^o, and begged from him the assistance of Ops^p. For it is allowable to jest, that you may not think me too much disturbed. It was early on the 8th that I sent my letter; and I received yours the evening of the same day in Pompeianum, by a quick conveyance ^o This Faberius appears to have been a clerk to Cæsar, and since made a tool of Antonius to insert in Cæsar's instructions what he thought fit. It was by such means that Antonius got possession of Cæsar's money; with some of which he bought Dolabella's concurrence in his schemes.

^p Cæsar's treasure had been secured in the temple of Ops; and in Latin the same word signifies also assistance, from whence arises the matter of Cicero's jest.

of two days. But, as I sent you word the very same day, I wrote a sharp letter to Dolabella; and if this has no effect, yet I apprehend he will not resist my personal application. I imagine you have settled the Alban account. What you have furnished me from the Patulcian account is most acceptable, and like everything you do. I thought Eros, whom I had left, was made for settling such affairs, which have got into confusion by his great mismanagement. But I must see about this with him. You will take upon yourself, as I have often mentioned to you, the whole concern of Montanus's business. I am not at all surprised at Servius's desponding conversation with you at the time of his departure; nor do I in any respect yield to him in despondency. If our friend Brutus, that excellent man, does not go into the senate on the 1st of June, I do not understand what he means to do in the forum. But he knows best. By what I perceive to be going on, I judge there has not been much gained by the 15th of March. Therefore I think daily more and more about going into Greece. For I do not see how I can be of any use to my Brutus, who, as you say, is himself thinking of leaving the country. I am not at all satisfied with Leonidas's letter. Respecting Herodes, I agree with you. I should like to have read Saufeius's^a account. I design to leave Pompeianum the 10th of May.

LETTER XIX.

ON the 7th of May while I was in Pompeianum I received two letters from you, one the sixth, the other the fourth day after their dates. I shall reply to them in their order. I am very glad that Barnæus should have delivered my letter to you so seasonably. You will manage with Cassius as you do everything else. How fortunate that I should have written to him upon the very point you advise four days before, and should have sent you a copy of my letter! But while I was in despair about Dolabella's deficiency, or paylessness^a (to use your own expression), behold Brutus's letter and yours! He is thinking of quitting the country. But I see a different haven^b nearer to one of my age; into which I should like better to be conveyed, while our Brutus is flourishing, and the republic established. But now, as you say, there is no choice. For you agree with me that my age is unsuitable to arms, especially to those of civil wars. Antonius wrote to me only about Clodius^c; that my gentleness and kindness was gratifying to himself, and would be a source of great satisfaction to me. But Pansa seems to be outrageous on the subject of Clodius, and likewise on that of Deiotarus; and uses severe language, if you choose to believe him. This, however, is not so well in my mind; that he vehemently reprobates this act of Dolabella's. Respecting those who wore chaplets^d; your sister's son, upon being accused by his father, wrote in answer, that he had worn a chaplet in honour of Cæsar; and had put it off on account of his mourning; in short, that he was ready to bear every reproach, for that he loved Cæsar even dead. I have written to Dolabella very explicitly, as you wished me to do. I have also written to Sica. I would not put this trouble upon you; and should be sorry to have him angry with you. I know Servius's manner of talking^e, in which I see more of alarm than of wisdom. But since we are all alarmed, I assent to Servius. Publius^f has been trifling with you. For Cærelia^g has been sent hither by these people to negotiate with me. But I soon persuaded her that what she asked was not only not agreeable to me, but not even admissible. If I see Antonius, I will use all diligence about Buthrotum. I come now to your last letter (though on the subject of Servius I have already replied) that I exalt Dolabella's deed. In truth, I think it could not have been better in such a case, and at such a time. But whatever I attribute to him, I do it from your letters. Yet I agree with you that it would be a better deed, if he paid me what he owes. I wish Brutus would occupy Astura. You commend me for making no determination about going abroad till I see how things are likely to turn out; but I have changed my purpose. However, I shall do nothing till I see you. I am pleased with Attica's returning thanks to me about her mother, to whom I have given up my whole house and stores; and I hope to see her again on the 11th. Give my compliments to Attica; I will take good care of Pilia.

LETTER XX.

I WENT by sea from Pompeianum to my friend Lucullus's on the 10th, where I arrived about 9 o'clock; and upon quitting the vessel I got your letter dated the 7th, which your messenger was said to have carried to Cumanum. The next day I received another through Lucullus about the same hour on which I had arrived; and I received one on the 9th dated from Lanuvium. Hear, therefore, my reply to all of them. In the first place, I am much pleased with what has been done in my concerns respecting both the payment and the business of Albius. But with regard to your Buthrotum, Antonius came to Misenum while I was in Pompeianum; and he had left it again before I heard of his being there. From thence he went to Samnium; so that I can give you little hope of my meeting him. The business of Buthrotum must therefore be managed at Rome. L. Antonius's^h harangue is quite horrible; Dolbella's excellent. Now² let him keep the money to himself if he will but pay it on the 15th. I should be sorry if Tertulla³ were to miscarry; for Cassius's need to be reared as well as Brutus's. I should be glad to know what is become of the queen⁴, and also of the young Caesar⁵. I have done with your first letter, and come now to the second. About the Quintuses and Buthrotum, when I come, as you say. I am much obliged for your advances to Cicero. You think I am mistaken in supposing that the republic depends upon Brutus; but so it is. It will either cease to exist, or it will be preserved by him or his party. To your advice of my sending up⁶ a written speech, let me, my Atticus, reply by a general maxim on these subjects, in which I am pretty well versed. There never was any poet or orator who thought anybody superior to himself. This is the case even with bad ones. What do you think then of Brutus, who has both genius and learning? Of whom also I have had some experience lately on the subject of his edict. I composed one at your request. I liked mine; he liked his own. Nay, when I had addressed to him my treatise on the best style of oratory, which I was induced to do almost at his earnest solicitation, he wrote word, not to me only, but to you also, that what I recommended he did not approve. Therefore, leave everybody, I beg, to write for himself. "Every one his own wife, mine for me; every one his own taste, mine for me." I cannot say much for the style of this, being taken from Attilius, a very harsh poet. I wish only that he⁷ may be allowed to address the people at all; for if he is allowed to remain in the city in safety, the cause is ours. For either nobody will follow the leader of a new civil war; or those will follow who may easily be overpowered. I come to the third letter. I am glad that Brutus and Cassius were pleased with my letter; and have in consequence written to them again. With regard to their wish that Hirtius may be made better through me; I use my best endeavours, and he talks most honourably; but he lives and is domesticated with Balbus, who talks honourably likewise: you must judge what you are to believe. I see you are greatly pleased with Dolabella; I am exceedingly so. I lived with Pansa in Pompeianum; who quite convinced me of his upright sentiments, and his desire of peace; but I see clearly that some people are seeking for an occasion of war. I approve of the proclamation of Brutus and Cassius. You ask me to take upon myself the consideration of what I think they ought to do. But opinions depend upon the time; which fluctuates every hour. That first act of Dolabella's, and this speech in opposition to Antonius, seem to me to have done much. The cause was utterly sinking. Now we appear likely to have a leader; which is the only thing the free towns and all good people want. You speak of Epicurus, and venture to pronounce that one should abstain from politics⁸. Does not the dear look of my Brutus deter you from such language? Q. the son, as you mention, is the right hand of Antonius. Through him therefore we shall easily carry what we wish⁹. If, as you suppose, L. Antonius should bring forward Octavius, I am anxious to know how he will address the people. I write this in haste; for Cassius's messenger is setting off immediately. I am going presently to pay my compliments to Pilia; then by water to feast with Vestorius. Best compliments to Attica.

LETTER XXI.

SOON after I had delivered to Cassius's messenger my letter to you on the 11th, my own messenger arrived, and (what was like a prodigy) without any letter from you. But it presently occurred to me that you must have been at Lanuvium. Eros hastened, that I might get a letter from Dolabella. He did not write about my business¹, for he had not yet received mine; but it was in answer to that of which I sent a copy to you, and was well expressed. As soon as I had despatched Cassius's messenger, I received a visit from Balbus. Gracious gods! how easily might you perceive his dread of quiet! You know the man, how reserved he is; but yet he spake freely of Antonius's designs, who was going round to the veteran soldiers, to secure the ratification of Caesar's acts, and to make them swear to enforce them everywhere; for which purpose the *duumviri*² were to examine them every month. He complained also of his own unpopularity; and his whole conversation showed his attachment to Antonius. In short, there is no relying upon anything³. To me it is no longer doubtful that affairs tend to war. For that deed⁴ has been done with a manly spirit, but with the prudence of a child. Who did not see that there was left an heir⁵ to the kingdom? What could be more absurd? "To fear this; to have no apprehension about the other⁶." Nay, at this very time there are many inconsistencies; as that Pontius's Neapolitan villa should be held by the mother⁷ of the tyrant-killer. I must read again and again my "Cato the Elder⁸," which I sent you,—for age makes me peevish; I am out of humour with everything; but my life has had its course⁹, let younger men see to it. You will continue to watch over my concerns as you do. I write or rather dictate this while the dessert is upon the table at Vestorius's. I intend to-morrow to be with Hirtius; and thus forsooth I hope to bring over to the honest party one of the five that are left¹⁰! It

Pray give my best compliments to Attica. I am eager for Octavius's speech, and anything else there may be,—particularly whether Dolabella's money begins to chink², or if he has altogether cancelled my account.

LETTER XXII.

HAVING understood from Pilia that a messenger was to be sent to you on the 15th, I have immediately scrawled something. In the first place, then, I wish you to know that I go from hence to Arpinum the 17th of May,—so that hereafter you will direct thither if there is anything, though I shall myself presently be at Rome. But I wish, before I arrive, to find out more accurately what is likely to happen; though I fear my conjectures may prove too true: for it is sufficiently clear what they aim at. My pupil³, who dines with me to-day, is greatly attached to him whom our Brutus stabbed; and, if you ask me, I plainly perceive they dread a state of quiet. This position they hold and openly maintain,—that he who has been killed was a most distinguished man, and that the whole state is thrown into disorder by his death; that what he did would be without effect as soon as we lay aside our fears; that his own clemency was his ruin, without which nothing of the kind could have happened to him. What occurs to me is, that if Pompeius⁴ comes up with a firm army, which is probable, there will certainly be war. The very idea and thought of this disturbs me: for what was formerly allowed to you⁵ will not now be allowed to me. I have not concealed my joy⁶: besides, they are fond of charging me with ingratitude. So that what was formerly allowed to you and many others will on no account be allowed. Must I declare myself then, and go into the field? It is better to die a thousand times, especially at this age. The 15th of March, therefore, is not so great a consolation as it was, because of the great blunder that it embraces. Still those young⁷ men "by their other well-doings put out this reproach". But if you have any better hope, since you both hear more and are admitted to their counsels, I wish you would write to me, and at the same time consider what I should do about a votive legation⁸. Many people in these parts warn me not to attend the senate on the first, as soldiers are said to be secretly engaged for that day, and expressly against the conspirators, who, I apprehend, will be safer anywhere than in the senate.

BOOK XV.

LETTER I.

OSAD news of Alexion¹. It is not to be believed how much I am afflicted; and that, not on account of what most persons suggest, asking what physician I should employ. For what have I now to do with a physician? Or if I should want one, is there such a scarcity? What I have lost is his affection towards me, his kindness and gentleness. This consideration also affects me; what is not to be feared when so temperate a man, so consummate a physician, is unexpectedly carried off by the violence of disease? For all this the only consolation is, that it is the condition of our birth that we should submit to whatever is incident to humanity. Respecting Antonius, I have already written to say that I had not met with him; for he came to Misenum while I was in Pompeianum, and was gone again before I knew of his arrival. But it happened that Hirtius was with me in Puteolanum when I read your letter. I read it to him, and entered upon the subject. In what relates to the first part² he was not less earnest than myself; and in conclusion he appointed me the arbiter not only of this business but of his whole consulship. With Antonius I will so manage, as to let him understand that if he satisfies me in this affair I will give myself wholly to him. I hope Dolabella is at home³. Let us come now to our friends⁴, of whom you say you entertain good expectations in consequence of the moderation of their proclamations. But I learned Hirtius's real sentiments when he left me on the 16th to go from Puteolanum to Naples for the sake of meeting Pansa. For I took him aside and counselled him in favour of peace. He could not deny that he was desirous of peace; but he feared the arms of our friends no less than those of Antonius. He confessed it was not without reason that both parties had a guard; but for his own part he was afraid of the arms of both: in short, there is nothing sound. About young Quintus I agree with you. Your letter to his father was extremely handsome, and could not fail of being most agreeable. I had no difficulty in satisfying Caecellia, who did not appear very solicitous^b; and if she were, assuredly I should not be so. I am surprised you should have listened at all to the lady^c, who you say was so troublesome to you: for as to my having spoken well of her before her friends, in the hearing of her three sons and her daughter, "the same person does not always utter the same thing^d." What is this? What is it that should make me walk about in an assumed character? Is not old age of itself a character sufficiently disgusting? What Brutus requests, that I would go to him previously to the first^e, he has mentioned also in a letter to me, and I may probably do so; but I cannot at all tell what he wants: for what counsel can I give him who am in need of counsel myself? While he has consulted his own immortalisation better than our tranquillity. The report about the queen^f will soon be extinguished. Pray remember about Flamma^g, if there is anything you can do. Yesterday I sent you a letter as I was going from Putrolanum; and I turned aside to Cumanum, where I saw Pilia almost well: I saw her besides at Balus near Cumæ; for she had come to attend a funeral, at which I likewise assisted. Cn. Lucullus, my intimate friend, was carrying his mother to her grave. That day, therefore, I staid in Sinuessanum, and the next morning setting out for Arpinum I scrawl this letter. I have nothing new, however, to tell you, or to ask you; unless, perhaps, you think what follows to be of any consequence. Our Brutus has sent me the speech he delivered at the meeting in the capitol, and has desired me to correct it (but not with a view to excite applause) before he publishes it. The speech is written with great elegance of sentiments and expression, so that nothing can exceed it. Yet, if I had had the same cause to conduct, I should have treated it with more warmth; you see what the subject is, and who is the person that speaks. I have, therefore, been unable to correct it; for in the style which our Brutus prefers, and agreeably to his judgment of the best method of speaking, he has so well succeeded in this oration that nothing can be more elegant. But I alone, whether rightly or not, am of a different opinion. I wish, however, that you would read the speech,—unless you have read it already,—and would let me know what you think of it; though I fear you may be misled by your name^h, and may be over-attic in your judgment: but if you will call to mind the thunders of Demosthenes, you will understand that what is consummately attic may be strongly expressed. But of these things when we meet. I did not care to let Metrodorus go to you either without a letter, or with a letter that contained nothing.

LETTER II.

On the 18th, on my way from Sinuessanum, after I had sent my letter to you and had proceeded from Cumæ to Viscianum, I received yours from the messenger. There was more than enough in it about Buthrotum. For you do not, nor can you, take a greater interest in that business than I do. It is thus proper for you to attend to my concerns and me to yours. I have accordingly undertaken this so, that I shall esteem nothing of superior obligation¹. I learned from your letter, and from others, that L. Antonius had made a scurvy harangue; but what was the nature of it I do not know, for you said nothing. About Menedemus² it is quite right. Quintus³ must assuredly be dictating what you write. I am glad you approve of my reason for declining to compose what you asked of me⁴, and you will approve it still more when you have read the speech, about which I wrote to you this morning. What you mention about the legions is perfectly true⁵; but you do not seem sufficiently to have considered what you can hope to have done by the senate in the affair of our Buthrotians. As far as my opinion goes (for I see so much), I do not think we⁶ shall long subsist; but even if we are disappointed of this resource⁷, you will not be disappointed about Buthrotum⁸. I feel as you do on the subject of Octavius's speech; and am not pleased with the preparations for his games⁹, and the appointment of Matius and Postumius to conduct them. Sæurna¹⁰ is a fit colleague for them. But all these people, as you perceive, are as much afraid of peace as we are of war. I should be glad if I could relieve Balbus from the odium he has incurred¹¹; but he does not himself believe it to be possible: therefore he turns his attention elsewhere. I am glad that you derive comfort from the first Tusculan Disquisition; for there is no resource either better or readier¹². I am not sorry that Flamma speaks so fairly. What may be the case of the Tyndaritan¹³, in which you are so earnest, I know not; yet I will give them my support¹⁴. These transactions seem to move this one-of-the-five*, especially the expenditure of the money[†]. I am sorry for Alexion; yet having fallen into so severe an illness, I think that he has been kindly dealt with. I should like to know who are his heirs in the second degree[‡], and what is the date of his will.

LETTER III.

I RECEIVED two letters from you on the 22d in Atinas, in answer to two of mine. One was dated the 18th, the other the 21st. To the earliest therefore first. Pray come to Tusculanum, as you propose. I mean to be there the 27th. When you say that we must submit to the conquerors, I do not agree with you; for many things appear to me preferable. As to what you recollect to have been done in the temple of Apollo during the consulship of Lentulus and Marcellus[‡]; neither the case nor the time is similar; especially as you mention that Marcellus and others are taking their departure. I must therefore find out and determine on the spot, whether I can safely remain in Rome. These new meetings alarm the inhabitants[§]; for we are placed in great straits. But let these things be disregarded; I can look upon still greater with unconcern. I have been made acquainted with Calva's will, a base and sordid fellow. I thank you for the care you take about Demonicus's accounts. I have already written very particularly to Dolabella about Marius, if only my letter has been delivered. For his sake I wish him success, as indeed I ought. I come now to the more recent letter. I have learned what I wanted about Alexion[¶]. Hirtius is in your interest[‡]. I wish Antonius were worse than he is[¶]. You mention Quintus the son. A volume of evils! Of the father we will speak when we meet. I am desirous of assisting Brutus in everything I can. I see you entertain the same opinion of his speech that I do. But I do not quite understand what you wish me to write, as if it were a speech delivered by Brutus; when he has himself published his own. How can this be? Would you have it as against a tyrant, who had been justly killed? I shall have much to say, and much to write; but it must be in another manner and time. The tribunes have done well about Cæsar's chair[¶]. And excellent the fourteen rows of knights. I am glad Brutus has been at my house, provided he was pleased, and staid as long as he liked.

c On the subject of Buthrotum.

¶ This must be supposed to relate to some passage in Atticus's letter, where he mentioned that Antonius was ill.

¶ It had been decreed, in flattery to Cæsar, that he should have a gilt chair in the senate and public places. Octavius wished to have this chair placed, in memory of Cæsar, at the games, but the tribunes forbade it; on which account they seem to have been applauded by the knights in the theatre, where they sat in fourteen rows of benches reserved by law for their exclusive use.

LETTER IV.

On the 23d about two o'clock a messenger arrived from Q. Fufius with a letter containing something about my restoring myself to him[†]; as silly as usual; unless, perhaps, whatever we dislike is apt to appear silly. I replied in a manner that I think you would approve. He brought me two letters from you, one of the 22d, the other the 23d. I shall answer the latter first. "And the legion?" I applaud the circumstance. And if Carfulenus too; the streams, as they say, will run upwards[‡]. You take notice of the factious counsels of Antonius. I wish he may act through the populace, rather than through the senate; and I imagine this is likely to be the case. But to me all his measures have a warlike tendency. If indeed Decimus Brutus's province is snatched away, whatever I may think of his strength, it seems impossible to be done without a war. But for this I do not wish, now that assurance[§] is given to the Buthrotians. You may smile; but I am sorry that this should not rather have been accomplished by my attention, diligence and influence. When you say that you do not know what is to become of our friends[¶], the same doubt has long since given me concern; so that the consolation I derived from the 15th of March already appears foolish. For we have shown a manly spirit, but, believe me, a childish prudence. The tree has been cut down, not torn up by the roots; and you see accordingly how it sprouts. Let us have recourse then to the Tusculan Disquisitions, since you often appeal to them. We must endeavour[¶] to conceal this from Saufeius; for my part I will never tell. You say that Brutus has written to inquire on what day I should go to Tusculanum. As I before mentioned to you, the 27th; and I hope to see you there as soon as possible; for I apprehend I shall be obliged to proceed to Lanuvium[¶], where there will be a great deal of talking. But I shall see about it. I revert now to the earlier letter, of which I pass over that first part relative to the Buthrotians, which is lodged in my inmost soul; if only, as you say, there is any opportunity of acting. You seem quite earnest on the subject of Brutus's speech, by urging it again so copiously. Should I then support the same cause for which he has written? should I write without his invitation? No interference can be more disrespectful. But,

† This expression may probably be copied from Fufius's letter.

‡ This is copied from Atticus's letter, and no doubt alludes to the martial legion under the command of Carfulenus, which deserted from Antonius at this time.

‡ The original is a Greek proverbial expression, signifying that it would be beyond all expectation; for Carfulenus had been a firm friend to Cæsar. In fact he did not join Brutus, but Octavius.

¶ May not this refer to the unwarranted assertion of some foolish person saying that he would be answerable for the safety of the Buthrotians? which Cicero pleasantly ridicules. Had a war broken out, it might be expected that Antonius would be otherwise employed than in settling soldiers in Buthrotum.

¶ The conspirators.

¶ This is said in jest, with reference to Saufeius's attachment to the sect of Epicurus; while the Tusculan Disquisitions are conducted upon principles totally opposite. It will be remembered that Atticus was also an Epicurean.

¶ Brutus and Cassius were at Lanuvium.

say you, something in the manner of Heracles^m. To that indeed I do not object; but the subject must be well considered, and we must wait for a ripper season of writing. For, whatever you may think of me, (and I should certainly wish you to think the best possible,) if things remain as they promise, (you will bear what I am going to say,) the 15th of March affords me no satisfaction. For heⁿ would never have returned; and we should not have been compelled by fear to confirm his acts. Or (to adopt Sanseius's maxims^o, and renounce those Tusculan Disquisitions to which you also invite Vestorius^p) so gracious towards me was he (whom even dead may the gods confound!) that, since we have not by his death regained our liberty, there was no reason, at my age, to dislike him for a master. I blush, believe me. But I have already written, and will not erase it. I could have wished the report about Menedemus had been true; and wish that about the queen may be so. The rest when we meet; especially what measures our friends should pursue; what also ourselves, if Antonius means to beset the senate with soldiers. If I had given this letter to his messenger, I was afraid he might open it. I have therefore sent on purpose; for yours required an answer.

^q How much I wish you could have given Brutus your assistance! I will therefore write to him. I have sent Tiro to Dolabella with a letter and instructions. Desire him to come to you; and if you have anything to say, write what you please. But see here! most provokingly, L. Cæsar begs me either to go to him at The Grove^r, or to let him know where he may find me; for Brutus wished him to have some conversation with me. A hateful and fruitless job! I think however I shall go, and from thence to Rome, unless I change my present purpose. I send you this in few words, for there is yet nothing from Balbus. I am therefore expecting to hear from you, and not only what has been done, but also what will be done.

LETTER V.

THE messenger that went to Brutus has brought back letters from him and Cassius. They earnestly desire my opinion; Brutus, indeed, which of the two plans^s he should adopt. O sad state of affairs! I have positively nothing to say, and therefore think of maintaining silence, unless you suggest something different. But if anything occurs to you, pray write. Cassius strongly begs and entreats me to make a good citizen of Hirtius. Do you think he is in his senses? 'Tis the fuller and the coals^t. I send you his letter. What you say respecting a decree of the senate for the provinces of Brutus and Cassius^u, is repeated by Balbus and by Hirtius; and the latter purposes himself to bring it on; for he is already in Tusculanum. He strongly advises me to keep away. He does this on account of the danger, which he says threatened him also. But for my part, even if there were no danger, I am so far from caring to prevent Antonius' suspicions of my dissatisfaction at his success, that the wish of avoiding him is of itself a reason why I am unwilling to go to Rome. Our friend Varro has sent me a letter, which he received from I know not whom (for he had erased the name), in which it was mentioned, that those veteran soldiers, whose claims^v were rejected, (for some of them were dismissed,) talked very seditiously; so that whoever was thought to have opposed their interests, would be in great danger at Rome. Besides, how should I manage my going, my returning, my countenance, my step, amongst that party^w. And if, as you say, L. Antonius is to go against Decimus^x, the rest against our friends^y, what should I do? or how should I conduct myself? I have therefore determined, as matters now stand, to absent myself from that city in which I have not only flourished with the highest dignity, but have enjoyed some share of it even under subjection. Yet I am not so much resolved to go out of Italy, (upon which I must deliberate with you,) as not to go up thither^z.

LETTER VI.

OUR friend Brutus has written to me, and likewise Cassius, that I might use my authority to secure Hirtius, whom they knew to have been hitherto well affected, though they could not entirely depend upon him. For I apprehend he is displeased with Antonius, but still attached to that cause. However, I wrote, recommending to him the dignity of Brutus and Cassius; and wish you to be acquainted with his answer, in case you should draw from it the same conclusion as I do, that the opposite party are even now afraid of our friends^a possessing more spirit than they really have.

"Hirtius to his Cicero.

"You ask if I am yet returned from the country; or whether, at a time when everybody is in activity, I am amusing myself in idleness. appointments being provided for so many years. As Brutus and Cassius may obtain anything of me through you, so I wish that by you they may as easily be induced to enter into no intemperate counsels. For you say that, at the time they wrote to you, they were retiring. Whither? or wherefore? Stop them. I beseech you, Cicero; and suffer not all these things to perish, which must be utterly ruined by plunder, by fire, by slaughter. Only, if they have any cause of fear, let them be upon their guard; but let them attempt nothing more. In good truth they will gain no more by violent counsels than by gentle ones, provided they are prudent. For this state of things, which is passing on, is not of a nature to last; but by opposition it presently assumes a power of doing mischief. Write to me in Tusculanum, and let me know what hopes you have of them."

This is Hirtius's letter; to which I replied, that they entertained no intemperate designs; and this I confidently affirmed. This, such as it is, I wished you to know. Since sealing my letter I have heard from Balbus that Servilia had returned, and confirmed the opinion that they would not go out of the country. I am now expecting a letter from you.

LETTER VII.

I THANK you for the letters you sent me, which indeed gave me much pleasure; especially that of our friend Sextus^b. You will say, "because he commends you." I think indeed that may be one reason; but yet before I came to that part, I was exceedingly pleased both with his sentiments in regard to the republic, and with the accuracy of his writing. The peace-maker Servius^c, with his little clerk, seems to have acted as an ambassador, and to be afraid of any captious proceeding. But he ought to have considered, that "it was no struggle of right," but what follows^d. Let me hear also from you.

LETTER VIII.

AFTER you left me I received two letters from Balbus; no news. Also one from Hirtius, who represents himself to be highly offended with the conduct of the veteran troops. I am anxious to know what they will do about the first of March^e. I have therefore sent Tiro, and several others with him, that whatever happens you may write to me by one of them. I have besides written to Antonius about an honorary legation, lest being an irritable man, he might be offended had I applied only to Dolabella. But as he is said to be difficult of access, I have written to Eutrapelus to present my letter to him, as having occasion for such an appointment. A votive legation is more honourable; but I may make use of both^f. Again and again I beg you to take care of yourself. I wish you could come to me; but if you cannot, we will attain the same end by letter. Græceius sends me word, that C. Cassius had informed him there were men provided to be sent armed to Tusculanum. This does not appear to me probable; but yet it is right to be upon one's guard, and to go about from one villa to another^g. To-morrow will produce something to direct us in the consideration of this business.

LETTER IX.

ON the evening of the third I received a letter from Balbus, saying that the senate was to meet on the 5th, for the purpose of appointing Brutus in Asia, Cassius in Sicily, to purchase corn for the use of the city. Wretched business! first, that they should receive any commission from these people; then, if any, that it should be such a lieutenant's commission^h. I know not if it is better than sitting by the Eurotasⁱ. But these things chance must govern. He says that at the same time a decree is to be passed for the allotment of the provinces to them, and to the rest of pretorian rank. This certainly is better than that Persic^j portico. For I would not have that distant Lacedæmon supposed to mean Lanuvium. Do you laugh, you will say, in such a state of affairs! What should I do? I am tired of weeping. Immortal gods! how the first page of your letter disturbed me! But what was that collision of arms in your house? I am glad however that this storm soon passed over. I am anxious to know what you have done with your commission^k, at once so sad and difficult of consultation. For it is indeed quite inextricable; so beset are we by all the troops. As for me, Brutus's letter, which you say you have read, has so disturbed me, that though I was before at a loss, yet I am become duller than ever through ^f A votive legation granted by the two consuls, and an honorary lieutenantcy from Dolabella. A votive legation was a nominal appointment in discharge of a vow. See letter 1 of this book.

^g To avoid being surprised. It should be mentioned, however, that the text in this place is very doubtful. In the Epist. ad Fam. xi. 20. D. Brutus admonishes Cicero to be upon his guard—cautum, et insidias vitantem.

^h During the time of their pretorship it is probable they could not be sent abroad but by some commission of this kind, which may have been devised by the friends of peace.

ⁱ The Eurotas was a river of Lacedæmon. The expression is probably a proverbial one, signifying, "to remain inactive," as Brutus and Cassius were doing at Lanuvium. The Romans used to give great names to their canals—"ductus aquarum isti Nilos et Euripos vocant."—De Leg. li. 1.

^j Having previously applied the name of Eurotas to the stream that flowed by Lanuvium, he goes on in the same figure of speech to call the portico of Lanuvium by the name of a portico at Lacedæmon; and concludes ironically, that he would not have Atticus suppose him to mean Lanuvium; thus humorously giving the true interpretation of his own metaphor.

^k Atticus appears to have been solicited to go to Lanuvium for the purpose of advising with his friend Brutus in the present difficult situation. See letter 10 of this book.

distress of mind¹. But I will write more when I am informed of what has been done. At present I have nothing to say, and the less, because I am doubtful if you will get this letter. For it is uncertain whether the messenger will see you. I am very anxious to hear from you.

LETTER X.

How affectionately is Brutus's letter written! How unlucky this time, when you are prevented from going to him! But what can I write? Should I advise him to accept the offer of these people? What more disgraceful? To attempt any thing? They dare not, neither can they. Come then, should I advise them to remain quiet? Who can answer for their safety? And if any violent measures are adopted with regard to Decimus, what will become of our friends, even if nobody offers to molest them? Not to celebrate the games? What more dishonourable? To exact corn! How does it differ from that appointment of Dion? Or what office in the state is more contemptible? In such a situation of things, counsel is not safe even for the person who gives it. This however I might disregard, if I were doing any good. But to enter upon it without any prospect of advantage; while he listens to the advice or even the entreaties of his mother, why should I interfere? I will however think what kind of letter I can write; for I cannot bear to be silent. I will presently send therefore either to Antium or to Circæi*.

LETTER XI.

I CAME to Antium on the 26th. Brutus was glad to see me. Afterwards in the presence of several persons, and of Servilla¹, Tertulla², and Portia³, he asked what I thought. Favonius also was there. I had meditated upon this as I went along, and gave it as my opinion that he should accept this corn commission in Asia; that nothing now remained for us to do but to secure ourselves; in which was involved the protection also of the republic itself. After I had entered into this discourse, Cassius came in; upon which I repeated the same sentiments. At this place Cassius with animated looks (you would say Mars himself was breathing) declared he would not go into Sicily. "Shall I accept an offer which is intended as an insult?" "What then do you propose to do?" said I. To which he replied, that he would go into Greece. "And what," said I, "will you do, Brutus?" "I will go to Rome," said he, "if you advise it." "But I do by no means advise it, for you will not be safe." "But if I could be safe, would you then approve it?" "So much so that I would not have you go away at all, neither at this time, nor into a province after your pretorship. But I do not advise you to trust yourself in the city." I added what will readily occur to you, why he would not be safe. A great deal was then said, and especially by Cassius, complaining of the opportunities which had been lost; and he heavily accused Decimus. I said we ought not to dwell upon what¹ was past; though at the same time I agreed with him. And having entered upon the consideration of what ought to have been done; without however saying anything new or anything more than is said every day; (for I did not touch upon the subject of having omitted to strike anybody else²;) but only that the senate ought to have been assembled, and the people more powerfully excited while their affections were yet warm: "It is taking the management of the whole republic," exclaims your female friend³; "this I never heard anybody advance." I checked myself⁴. At length Cassius seemed disposed to go into Sicily; (for Servilla engaged that the mention of the corn should be expunged from the decree;) and our friend⁵ was soon driven from that idle⁶ talk; for he said that he acquiesced. He determined therefore that the games should be celebrated in his name, but without his being present. And he appeared willing to proceed into Asia from Antium. Not to tire you; I had no satisfaction in that visit, besides the consciousness of having done my duty. For it was not to be suffered that he should leave Italy without my seeing him. Excepting for this debt of affection and kindness, I might say to myself— "What is the use of your coming hither, O prophet⁷!" I found the vessel⁸ shattered, or rather gone to pieces. Nothing was done with wisdom, nothing with prudence, nothing with regularity. So that if I before did not hesitate, yet still less do I now hesitate to fly away from hence; and that as soon as possible; "where I may hear neither of the deeds nor the name of the Pelopidae⁹." But while I think of it, let me inform you that Dolabella has appointed me his lieutenant from the 2d of April¹⁰. I was told of it yesterday evening. A votive appointment you did not like; and indeed it was absurd, that having bound myself by vows "if the republic should subsist," I should now discharge them when it is overturned. Besides, the honorary legations have, I think, a definite period by the Julian law; and it is not easy to a legation of this kind¹¹ to add leave to go in and out when you please; which is now granted to me. And the right which this licence gives me for five years is charming. Though why should I think of five years? The business appears to me to be contracted within a little space¹². But let me not utter ill omens.

LETTER XII.

THIS is good news about Buthrotum. But I had already sent Tiro with a letter^f to Dolabella as you desired. What harm? I thought I had written sufficiently distinctly about our friends at Antium^g, that you needed not to doubt of their remaining quiet, and accepting Antonius's insulting offer. Cassius scorned the business of the corn, which Servilia engaged to get expunged from the decree of the senate. But our friend^h, with all his dignity, said he would go into Asia, after he had agreed with me that he could not safely reside in Rome. For he thought it better to exhibit the games without being present. He was collecting vessels, and preparing for his passage. In the mean time they designed to remain in the same neighbourhood. Brutus talked of going to *Astura*ⁱ. L. Antonius kindly indeed by letter desires me not to make myself uneasy^j. I acknowledge this as one favour received; and may perhaps receive a second, unless he should come to Tusculanum. How intolerable are these negotiations^k! which however are tolerated^l. Which of Brutus's party^m is to blame for thisⁿ? There is, I am persuaded, no want of sense, no want of spirit in Octavianus^o; and he seemed to be affected as we could wish towards our heroes. But it is matter of deep consideration what reliance can be placed on his age, his name^p, his succession, his education. His stepfather^q, whom I saw at Astura, thought he was not to be trusted. But he must be cherished however, if for no other reason, that he may be disunited from Antonius. It is well done of Marcellus, if he directs our own's own^r; who seemed to me to be much attached to him. He^s did not place much reliance on Pansa and Hirtius. They^t have a good natural disposition, if it is but firm^u.

^f Upon the subject of Buthrotum, about which Atticus appears now to have had some satisfactory assurance, perhaps through the instrumentality of Dolabella. See letter 14 of this book.

^g Brutus and Cassius.

ⁱ To Cicero's house. See letter 3 of this book, and book xiv. letter 19.

^j Under the apprehension of his Tusculan villa being seized. See letter 8 of this book.

^k That we should be forced to negotiate for our security.

^l Antonius being suffered to proceed with impunity.

^m So the word Bruti is to be understood. See book xiv. letter 14.

ⁿ For suffering Antonius to live.

^o The same who is before called Octavius; but his adoption into Cesar's family having been confirmed, he took the name of C. Julius Cæsar Octavianus, that of Augustus being added afterwards.

^p The name and inheritance of Cæsar.

^r It is consonant with Atticus's manner to suppose that he may thus have designated the young Quintus, meaning Cicero's own brother's own son.

^t Pansa and Hirtius.

^u He intimates the same thing in letters 1 and 6 of this book, and again in letter 22. I know not if any apology might be expected for giving a new interpretation to the concluding sentences of this letter. Suffice it to say, that I was dissatisfied with the explanation of former commentators, and always incline to resist the itch of conjectural emendations, the offspring of idleness and vanity. At the same time I should add, that both Middleton and Mongault apply this to Octavianus.

LETTER XIII.

ON the 24th I received two letters from you. I shall reply to the earliest first. I agree with you that I should neither take the lead, nor close the rear; but should nevertheless favour them^v. I have sent you my speech, and leave the keeping and the publication of it to your discretion. But when shall we see the time that you will think it may be produced? I do not understand how the truce you mention can possibly take place. It is better to use no opposition; which is the policy I mean to adopt. When you say that two legions have arrived at Brundisium, you get all information first^w: write me word therefore of everything you hear. I am expecting Varro's Dialogue. I now approve of undertaking something in the manner of Heraclides^x, especially as you anticipate it with so much delight: but I wish to know of what kind you would have it. As I mentioned to you before, or formerly, (since you prefer this expression,) you have, to tell you the truth^y, made me the more desirous of writing, by adding to your own opinion, which was well known to me, the authority of Peduceus, which is always great, and of the first weight with me. I will endeavour therefore to prevent your charging me either with idleness, or want of attention. Vectenus and Faberius I cherish, as you advise. I suspect Claelius of no evil design, although—But what has he done? On the subject of maintaining our freedom, than which assuredly nothing is sweeter, I agree with you. Behave so to Gallus Caninius? The wicked man^z! What else can I call him? Should I call him the cautious Marcellus? Such would I call myself; yet not so very cautious. I have now replied to your longer and earlier letter; but what shall I reply to the shorter and more recent one, except that it was most delicious? The news from Spain is excellent. Might I but see my Balbilus^a safe, the support of my old age. I may say the same of Annius, considering the attention I receive from Visellia^b. But these things are subject to the lot of human nature. You say that you know nothing of Brutus; but Selicia informs me that M. Scaptius^c is arrived, and that he is to come to her, not with any display, but privately; and that I should know everything; which I will immediately communicate to you. In the mean time you mention, in the same letter, that a servant of Bassus is come, who brings intelligence of the Alexandrian legions being in arms; that Bassus is sent for^d, and Cassius is expected. What say you?

^v The party of Brutus and Cassius.

^w Though Cicero was now in the neighbourhood of Puteoli, and consequently much nearer to Brundisium, yet news from thence had arrived at Rome before it reached him.

^x See letter 4 of this book.

^y The text has been variously tortured. I would point it thus—Ad scribendum, dicere tibi vere, fecisti me acriter, &c. I. e. ut possim dicere tibi vere.

^z This appears to me to relate to Marcellus, whatever he may have done; otherwise I see not how the following expression, cautum Marcellum, should come to be in the accusative case, unless indeed it be copied from Atticus.

^a I apprehend the word Balbilus is but a diminutive from Balbus, and so afterwards Annius for Annius.

^d To put himself at the head of the Alexandrian legion.

The republic seems to be recovering its rights. But we must not presume beforehand. You know the unsteadiness of these troops^d, and their habits of plunder. Dolabella is the best of men. Though while I am writing at my dessert, I hear that he is come himself to Baiz, yet he wrote to me from Formianum a letter, which I received upon quittin the bath, saying that he had done everything to th utmost about the payment. He accuses Vectenu of shuffling, as such people are accustomed to do but adds that my friend Sestius has taken the whole business upon himself. He is an excellent man, and very much attached to me; yet I want to know what Sestius should be able to do in this affair more than any one of us. If however there should be anything beyond my expectation, you will take care to inform me. But if, as I imagine, it is a lost case, you will nevertheless write; for such a circumstance will not affect me. Here I amuse myself with philosophical speculations, (for what else can I do?) and copiously explain what relates to our duty, addressing myself to Cicero. For on what subject can a father more properly speak to his son? Afterwards I shall proceed to something else. In short, there shall remain some fruit of this excursion. Varro was expected to-day or to-morrow. But I am hastening away to Pompeianum; not that anything can be more beautiful than this place; but there I shall be less molested by visitors. Pray let me know what accusation is brought in the case of Myrtilus, who I hear has suffered punishment; and whether it is quite clear by whom he was corrupted. While I write this, I imagine the speech will just have been delivered to you. I am almost afraid to hear what you may think of it. Though how does it concern me, if it is not to come out till the republic is restored? About which what are my hopes? I dare not write.

LETTER XIV.

ON the 26th I received a letter from Dolabella, of which I send you a copy. In this he says that he has done everything that you could wish. I immediately wrote to him in return with the fullest expression of my thanks. But that he might not be surprised at my writing twice on the same subject, I gave it as a reason, that I had not before been able to have any personal communication with you. Not to detain you, the following is a copy of my letter:—

“Cicero to his Dolabella, Consul.

“HAvING before heard by letter from my friend Atticus of your great liberality and extreme kindness towards him; and having it also under your own hand, you that had done what we desired, I wrote to express my thanks to you in such terms, that you might understand you could not have conferred upon me a greater favour. But Atticus having since come himself to me at Tusculanum for this single purpose of returning you his thanks, through me, for the extraordinary attention and great kindness he had experienced from you in the Buthrotian affair; I could not refrain from repeat-

^d This seems the most natural interpretation, though not supported by commentators; who have followed each other in applying the words to Antonius and his party.

^e Meaning that he had no hope at all, but avoided the ill omen of saying so.

ing the same to you more distinctly in this letter. For of all the marks of your affection and civility towards me, my Dolabella, which are very great, let me assure you that I esteem this the highest and most grateful, by letting Atticus see my regard for you, and yours for me. For the rest, though the settlement of Buthrotum has been your work, and we are naturally inclined to support the fruits of our own exertion, yet I wish again and again to recommend both the cause and the city to your patronage, that you may be pleased to cover it with your authority and assistance. You will confer a lasting security on the Buthrotians; and will save Atticus and me from much trouble and anxiety, if for my honour's sake you will let them always remain under your protection. Which again and again I earnestly entreat you to do.”

Having finished this letter, I devoted myself to my compositions, which I fear may in several places call for your little red marks^f, so discomposed am I, and occupied with deep^g thoughts.

LETTER XV.

CONFOUND L. Antonius! if he molests the Buthrotians. I have drawn up my attestation^h, which you may countersign when you please. If L. Fadius the ædile demands the money belonging to the people of Arpinum, deliver up even the whole of it. (I wrote to you in a former letter about the 110 sestertia (900*l.*) which were to be provided for Statiusⁱ.) If therefore Fadius asks for it, I wish it to be given to him; but to nobody besides Fadius. I think there is some other deposit at my house, which I have written to Eros to give back^j. The queen^k I hate. Ammonius, the voucher of her promises, knows that I am justified in what I do. They^l were all connected with learning and becoming my character, so that I should not mind declaring them in the public assembly. Sara, independently of my knowing him to be a bad man, was besides insolent to me. For once only I saw him in my house, when asking him civilly what he wanted, he said he came to look for Atticus. But of the haughtiness of the queen herself, when she was in the gardens on the other side of the Tiber, I cannot speak without great pain. Let me, then, have nothing to do with such people, who seem to think not so much that I have no spirit, as that I have scarcely common feeling. Eros's mismanagement, as I conceive, is an obstacle in the way of my going abroad. For while I ought to have abundance, from the balance which he drew the fifth of April, I am under the necessity of borrowing. And what was received from the produce of my estate, I supposed to have been laid by for that temple^m. But ⁱ Statius appears to have been a freed-man of Q. Cicero. See book v. letter 1; and book xv. letter 19.

^j This settlement of Cleoer's accounts seems to have been made preparatory to his going into Greece. See letter 17 of this book. ^k Cleopatra.

^l The promises he had received from Cleopatra, it may be, of books, or statues.

^m In which he proposed to consecrate his daughter's memory. See book xii. letter 18, &c.

I have given instructions about these matters to Tiro, whom I have sent to Rome on that account. I did not care to trouble you, who had already trouble enough. The more modest my Cicero is, the more I feel for him. For upon this subject he mentioned nothing to me, to whom he ought particularly to have written; but he wrote to Tiro to say, that since the first of April, when the year ends, he had received nothing. You were always of opinion, agreeably to your natural disposition, and thought also that it concerned my dignity, that he should have from me not only a liberal, but also a handsome and ample allowance. Therefore I wish you would manage (what I can transact through nobody else, or I would not trouble you), that there may be paid by exchanges at Athens what is sufficient for his yearly expenses. Eros will furnish the money for this purpose. I send up Tiro; therefore you will^a be so good as to take care about it, and write me word if anything occurs to you upon the subject.

LETTER XVI.

At length a messenger is arrived from Cicero with a letter written, in good truth, after the ancient manner^c, which of itself shows some degree of proficiency. Other people likewise give me good accounts. Leonidas, however, still uses the same expression of "hitherto." But Herodes gives him the highest commendations. What think you? Though these should prove mere words, I am gratified to receive them on this subject, and gladly become a credulous hearer. If you have heard anything from Statius that concerns me, I should be glad to be informed of it. I assure you this place^d is beautiful, and quite retired; and, if you wish to write anything, free from interruption. But I know not how it is, "Sweet home." Accordingly my steps revert to Tusculanum^e. For, after all, this rude scene would soon grow tiresome. I am besides afraid of the rains, if my prognostics^f are true; for the frogs are exercising their rhetoric. I beg you to let me know where, and on what day, I can see our friend Brutus.

LETTER XVII.

I RECEIVED two letters on the 14th, one dated that day, and one the day before. Therefore to the earliest first. You will inform me about Brutus, when you know yourself. I had heard of the pretended alarm of the consuls^g; for Sica, very affectionately indeed, but with unnecessary agitation, brought me an account of that suspicion. But what is it you say, "that we must be content with what is offered?" For not a word has been ^a Cicero sent up his confidential freed-man Tiro with directions to communicate with Atticus upon the allowance for his son at Athens. ^c See book xiv. letter 7.

ⁱ The original is part of a Greek proverb.

^j Though Pompeianum belonged to Cicero, yet he was most at home in Tusculanum.

^k Cicero had translated the "Prognostics" of Aratus.

^l Under pretence of personal danger the consuls appear to have surrounded themselves with a guard, perhaps to excite hostile feelings towards the conspirators.

^m The original is a Greek proverbial expression, quoted before, book vi. letter 5. It probably alludes here, as in the former instance, to the partial payment of some debt.

mentioned by Siregiusⁿ. I am not pleased with this. I have been vexed about your neighbour Pletorius, that anybody should have heard it before me. You have acted quite right in the case of Syrus. I imagine you will easily stop L. Antonius^o through his brother Marcus. I forbade the money to be given to Antro, or to anybody, except L. Fadius the seditious; but you had not then received the letter. It cannot either safely or properly be done otherwise. With regard to the deficiency of 100 sestertia (800*l.*) to be provided for Cicero, I should wish you to inquire of Eros what is become of the rent of the houses^p. I am not displeased with Arabio's conduct in the affair of Sitius. About my journey I think nothing, till I have settled my accounts^q; in which I believe you agree with me. I have replied to your first letter: now hear what I have to say to the other. You act as you always do, in assisting Servilia, that is Brutus^r. I am glad you do not trouble yourself about the queen, and especially that you approve of my conduct. I have been informed by Tiro of the state of Eros's accounts, and have sent for him. I am much obliged by your engaging that Cicero shall be in no want. I hear great things of him from Messala, who called upon me on his return from them^s at Lanuvium. And indeed his own letter is so affectionately and classically written, that I might read it to a public audience, for which I think he deserves the more indulgence. Sestius, I imagine, is not sorry about Bucilius^t. If Tiro comes to me, I think of going to Tusculanum. But I beg you to inform me without delay whatever happens which it may concern me to know.

LETTER XVIII.

THOUGH I thought I had sufficiently explained to you on the 15th what I wanted, and what I wished you to do if it was convenient to you; yet after I had set out, and was passing over the lake^u, I determined to send Tiro to you, that he might be present at the transactions^v which were in agitation. And I have also written to Dolabella to ^w Nothing is known of Siregius, or several other names which occur in this letter; they may probably have been connected with Cicero only in his private and pecuniary transactions.

^x From giving trouble to the Buthrotians. See letter 15 of this book. ^y See letter 15 of this book.

^z This may possibly allude to the houses mentioned book xii. letter 32, from the rents of which he proposed to defray his son's expenses at Athens.

^{aa} In the text is inserted a Greek letter, the meaning of which has been much disputed. It seems to me most probable that it is used for "accounts," being the first letter of the word λόγος.

^{bb} Atticus had given to Servilia a sum of money for Brutus's use, probably the same which is mentioned in Corn. Nepos's life of Atticus, amounting to 100 sestertia, or 800*l.* From the same author it appears, that after Brutus was in Ephesus, he sent him another present of 300 sestertia, or 2400*l.* ^{cc} The conspirators.

^{dd} Sestius and Bucilius were the names of two of the conspirators. What particular circumstance is here alluded to, is not known: perhaps the collecting vessels to transport himself and his adherents to Ephesus. See book xvi. letter 4.

say, that, if he thought fit^a, I should be glad to set off; and I have asked him about the mules of burden^b for the journey. Let me beg^c that in these matters (since I understand you are very much occupied, partly about the Buthrotians, partly about Brutus, the providing for whose games I suspect devolves wholly upon you, and in great measure also the conduct of them) that therefore in an affair of this kind you will give me a little of your assistance; for much will not be requisite. Things appear to me to tend to slaughter, and that at no great distance. You see the men; you see the arms that are collected. I do not think myself by any means safe. If you think otherwise, I wish you would write to me; for I would much rather remain at home, if I can do it with propriety.

LETTER XIX.

WHAT further attempt^d is to be made in the case of the Buthrotians? For you mention that you have been waiting in vain. And what does Brutus say of himself? I am truly sorry you should be so detained; for which we may thank the ten^e men. It is a troublesome business, but must be borne, and is most acceptable to me. Respecting the employment of arms, I never saw anything more open. Let me be off, then; but, as you say, we will talk of it together. What Theophanes wants I cannot tell: for having written to me, I answered him as I could; but he says he wishes to come to me, partly about his own affairs, and partly about something that concerns me. I am impatient to hear from you. Pray see that nothing is done^f rashly. Statius has written to me to say that Q. Cicero had strongly affirmed to him in conversation that he could not bear these proceedings, and that he was resolved to go over to Brutus and Cassius. I want now to understand this; for what it means I am unable to explain. He may design something in a fit of passion against Antonius; he may aim at some new glory; it may be all a sudden impulse; and assuredly so it is. But yet I have my fears; and his father is much disturbed; for he knows what that person^g formerly ^a Cicero being appointed his lieutenant was obliged to wait for Dolabella's sanction.

^b Going in the capacity of lieutenant to the consul, he was entitled to a supply of mules.

^c This must be understood, upon which the following sentence depends.

^d Relating to the settlement of his affairs previous to quitting the country.

^e This may either mean an attempt on the part of L. Antonius and others to molest the Buthrotians, [see letter 15 of this book,] or an attempt on the part of Atticus to secure them. I incline to the former explanation. The letter being in answer to one from Atticus, several particulars in it are rendered obscure from our ignorance of the circumstances to which they allude.

^f This expression is probably a humorous one, taken from the decemviri, or ten persons, by whom the laws of Rome were framed; and applied, perhaps by Atticus in the first instance, to some ten people distinguished by their disregard for the republic, who at this time, it may be, threatened to divide and appropriate Cicero's property. See letter 8 of this book.

^g Probably said in relation to the designs of evil-minded persons on Cicero's property.

^h Perhaps Dolabella. See book xiii. letter 9, where the very same Greek expressions are applied to young Quintus's conduct.

said of him to me; things not to be revealed. In short, I do not know what he is at. I am to receive from Dolabella such despatches^o as I please; that is, none at all. Tell me; did C. Antonius wish to be made a septemvir^p? He was undoubtedly worthy^q of it. It is, as you mention, with regard to Menodemus. You will let me know everything.

LETTER XX.

I HAVE returned my thanks to Vectenus,—for nothing could be more kind. Let Dolabella's despatches be what you please; only let me have something, or at least a message to Nicias^r: for who, as you say, did not before understand this arrangement^s? Do you suppose that any sensible man now entertains a doubt but that it is a journey of despair, not of business? You say that men, and good ones too, already speak of the republic being in extremity. For my part, the very day on which I heard that tyrant^t called in the assembly "a most eminent man," I began to distrust. But when I was with you at Lanuvium, and saw that our friends had only so much hope of life as Antonius had been pleased to afford them, I quite despaired. Therefore, my Atticus, I would have you receive this^u with the same firmness with which I write it: that species of destruction, by which you are likely to fall^v, you will esteem disgraceful, and almost denounced against us by Antonius. From this snare I have determined to withdraw, not for the purpose of flight, but in the hope of a better death. The fault rests wholly with Brutus. You say that Pompeius^w has been received at Carthia. Now therefore they must send an army against him. To which camp then should I betake myself? for Antonius cuts off any middle course. That camp is weak; this is wicked. It is time therefore to hasten away. But help me with your advice, whether I should go from Brundisium, or from Puteoli. Brutus adopts a hasty but prudent counsel^x. I am much concerned: for when shall I see him again? But we must bear the afflictions incident to humanity. You are yourself unable to see him. The gods confound this man who is dead^y, for having ever molested Buthrotum! But, leaving what is past, let us consider what is yet to be done. Though I

^o Going in the capacity of Dolabella's lieutenant, he might be supposed to bear despatches.

^q This is to be understood as said in derision, the commissioners being persons of no reputation.

^r Nicias was the intimate friend of Dolabella, and being to accompany him in his province of Syria, [see book xiv. letter 9.] he had probably already set out before him on that expedition.

^t Caesar. See book xiv. letter 11.

^u What follows.

^v The text has been supposed to be corrupt. It may perhaps relate to Cicero's apprehension of Antonius's power and cruelty, which Atticus may have declared his determination to abide. Had we Atticus's letters, the sense would probably be clear.

^w Sextus Pompeius, who still retained a powerful army in Spain.

^x In retreating from Italy.

have not yet seen Eros, yet from his letter, and from what Tiro has ascertained, I am pretty well master of his accounts. You say that I ought to borrow two hundred sestertia (1600*l.*) for five months,—that is, to the first of November. The payment of the money due from Quintus will fall upon that day. I should be glad therefore (as Tiro assures me you would not wish me to go up to Rome expressly for this purpose) that, if you do not object to such a business, you would find out from whence the money can be procured, and contract for it on my behalf. This is what is wanting for the present. I must inquire more particularly about the balance from himself^a; and in this, about the rents of the dowry^a estate, which, if they are regularly paid to Cicero, though I wish him to have a liberal allowance, yet will be nearly sufficient for him. I am aware that I must also have money for my journey; but the former may be paid out of the estates as it becomes due; what I want for myself must be had at once. And though I apprehend that he who is afraid of mere shadows^b is driving on to slaughter, yet I shall not set off till my accounts are cleared. But whether they are unravelled or not, I will examine with you. I have thought it proper to write this with my own hand; and have accordingly done so. About Fadius, as you mention: but to nobody else^c. I shall hope to have an answer from you to-day.

LETTER XXI.

I HAVE to acquaint you that Quintus, the father, is exulting with delight; for his son has written to say that he had wished to go over to Brutus for this reason; that Antonius having pressed him to get him made dictator, and to occupy some fortress, he had refused to do it; and he refused from fear of vexing his father, from which time Antonius had been his enemy. "But afterwards," says he, "I recollected myself^d, being apprehensive that in his anger towards me, he might do you^e some injury; therefore I have pacified him; and indeed have received from him a promise of four hundred sestertia (3200*l.*) certain, with the hope of the rest^f." Statius writes word that he is desirous of living with his father; and, what is surprising, he^g is also glad of it. Did you ever know a more confirmed profligate than he is^h? I quite approve of your hesitation in the affair of Canusⁱ. I had suspected nothing about the debts; but supposed ^e From fear of irritating Antonius he checked his desire of joining Brutus.

^f His father.

^g What was further necessary to discharge his debts.

^h Statius himself, who was freed-man and steward to Quintus, and had, by his influence with the father, excited the jealousy and hatred of the son.

ⁱ This appears to be said of young Quintus, whose story Cicero distrusts, thinking that it was a trick to get money from his father.

^j See book xiii. letters 41 and 49, where Cana may probably be the daughter of Canus here mentioned. It will be recollected that she was proposed as a wife for young Quintus.

the dowry^j to have been entirely repaid. What you defer, that you may speak with me personally, I shall be anxious to hear. You may keep the messenger as long as you please; for I know you are busy. About Xeno you have managed admirably. I will send you what I am writing, as soon as it is finished. You mentioned to Quintus that you had written to him; but nobody brought the letter. Tiro says that you do not now approve of Brundisium^k, and that you talked something about soldiers. But I had already fixed upon Hydruntum^l. I was influenced by your five hours' passage. But what a long voyage is this^m! However, we will see about it. I received no letter from you on the 21st; for now what news is there? You will come then as soon as you are able. I hasten my departure, that Sextusⁿ may not first arrive, whom they report to be on his way.

LETTER XXII.

I REJOICE with you upon the departure^o of young Quintus. He will give us no further trouble^p. I am ready to believe that Pansa talks favourably; for I know that he has always united himself with Hirtius. I suppose he may be very friendly towards Brutus and Cassius, if he can find his advantage in it; but when will he go near them? Likewise an enemy to Antonius; but when? or why? How long are we to be trifled with^q? I mentioned that Sextus was on his way, not as if he were just at hand; but because he certainly acts with that view, and will on no account lay down his arms. If he persists, war must be the consequence. But here our Cytherius^r declares that nobody but the conqueror shall live. What will Pansa say to this? And if war takes place, as it seems probable, which will he join? But of these and other matters when we meet; to-day, as you intimate, or to-morrow.

LETTER XXIII.

I AM wonderfully distracted, yet without any particular uneasiness; but a great number of things occur to me both ways on the subject of my journey. "How long is this to last?" you will say. As long as there is room for hesitation, which will be till I am fairly embarked. If I hear from Pansa, I will send you both my letter and his. I am expecting Silius, to whom I will give^s the memoir I have drawn up^t. If there is any news, you will acquaint me with it. I have sent a letter to Brutus. If you know anything about his progress, I shall be obliged to you to inform me.

^t A short account of the state of public affairs. The same Greek word is employed in the same sense, book ii. letter i.

LETTER XXIV.

THE messenger which I sent to Brutus returned from his journey the 26th. Servilia informed him that Brutus had set out that day at ten o'clock. I was sorry my letter had not been delivered. Silius did not come to me. I drew up that statement, and have sent the account to you. I want to know on what day I may expect you.

LETTER XXV.

THERE is great variety of opinions about my going abroad, for I have many visitors. But let me beg you to take this matter into consideration. It is a thing of some importance. Do you approve it, if I think of returning by the 1st of January? My mind is evenly balanced, yet so that I incline to go, provided my conduct gives no offence. And you have also ably pointed out the day, that was formerly held sacred; that is, the mysteries^a. But however this may be, accident must regulate my determination about the journey. Let me therefore continue to doubt. For a winter voyage is an odious thing; which was the reason of my asking you about the day of the mysteries. I think, as you say, that I shall see Brutus. I mean to go from hence the last day of the month.

LETTER XXVI.

I SEE that you have done everything about Quintus's business; yet he is uneasy and doubtful whether he should humour Lepta, or shake Silius's credit. I have heard say that L. Piso wishes to get away on some appointment under a forged decree of the senate. I should like to know if there is any truth in it. The messenger, whom I told you I had sent to Brutus at Anagninum, returned on the night previous to the first of the month, bringing me a letter, in which there was one thing inconsistent with his consummate good sense; that is, that he wanted me to attend his games^b. I replied, that in the first place I was already set out, so that it was no longer in my power; in the next place, that it would be very strange for me, who have never gone to Rome at all since this assumption of arms^c, and that, not so much in consideration of my danger, as of my dignity, suddenly to come up to the games. For at such a time to exhibit the games is quite right for him,—it is part of his duty; but as it is no part of my duty to see them, so neither is it becoming. I am indeed exceedingly desirous that they should be exhibited, and should be well received, which I trust will be the case; and I entreat you to let me know from the very beginning how they go off, and afterwards to pursue the detail through each succeeding day. But enough about the games. The rest of his letter sometimes inclines one way, sometimes another; yet emits occasional sparks of vigour. That you may judge for yourself what to think of it, I send you a copy of the letter, though my messenger informed me that he had also brought a letter from Brutus to you, which had been forwarded to you from Tusculanum. I have so arranged my journey as to be at Puteoli the 7th of July; for I wish to embark as soon as I can, yet so as to use all human precaution in my voyage. You may relieve M. Ælius from all further care. He wants permission to make some excavations at the extremity of his property, which are to pass under ground, and to be subject to certain service^d. Let him know that I have long since objected to it, and that nothing would be an equivalent to me. But, as you say to me, let it be expressed with all gentleness; and so as rather to relieve him from all further care, than to let him suppose that I am at all offended. I beg you likewise to speak freely with Cascelius upon that subject of Tullius^e. It is a small concern^f; but you have very properly adverted to it. It was conducted with too much craftiness. If he had any way imposed upon me, which he was near doing, unless you had ill-naturedly^g stepped in, I should have been very angry. However it may be therefore, I wish the business to be stopped. Remember ^h You will take care to give possession to the person for whom Cærellia applies, at the highest price which was offered at the sale. I think this was three hundred and eighty sestertia (30000*l.*). If there is any news, or if you foresee anything that is likely to happen, I should wish you to write to me as often as possible. Remember to make my excuse to Varro, as I desired you, for my backwardness in writing. I hope Mundus will trim his opponentⁱ. Let me know (for you are curious about such things) what M. Ennius has done respecting the will. From Arpinas, July 2d.

LETTER XXVII.

I AM pleased that you should persuade me to do what I had already done of my own accord the day before. For by the same messenger who took my letter to you on the 2nd, I wrote also to Sestius in terms of great regard. He does kindly to follow me to Puteoli, but his complaint is unreasonable. For it was not so much my business to wait for ^a I have given what appeared to me the most natural interpretation of this passage, which is very obscure and probably much corrupted.

^b By comparison with letter 29 of this book, there is reason to suppose that this relates to some interest of money due to Cicero.

^c After the sentence relating to Tullius; which seems to be inserted without any other connexion with the preceding, than what may have arisen from its place in Atticus's letter; he seems here to revert to the subject of M. Ælius's request, which Atticus may have been the first to mention.

^d This I understand to be said in jest; the notice which Atticus had taken of the business having thwarted Ælius's designs.

^e The text is too much corrupted to be intelligible.

^f The text is here likewise either deficient, or too concise to admit of any certain interpretation in our ignorance of the circumstances. The name occurs again in letter 29 of this book.

^g See the conclusion of book v., also the last sentences of book vi. letter 1. It was perhaps deemed a profanation to travel, or to transact any unnecessary business, at the time of this solemn festival, which I conceive must be the same that in the passage referred to in the sixth book is called "the Roman Mysteries."

him on his return from Cosanum, as his, either not to go till he had seen me, or to come back sooner. For he knew I was anxious to set off, and had written to say that he would come to me at Tusculanum. I am troubled at the tears you shed upon leaving me⁴. If you had done so in my presence, I might possibly have changed altogether my resolution of going. But I like the hope, with which you consoled yourself, of our soon meeting again, which expectation is indeed my greatest support. You shall have no want of letters. I will inform you of everything relating to Brutus. I shall very soon send you my treatise upon Glory, and I will make out something in the manner of Heraclides, which may lie by in your closet. I remember about Plancus. Attica has reason to complain⁵. Your information about Bacchis, and about the chaplets on the statues, was highly acceptable; and I trust you will hereafter omit nothing, not only of so great, but of ever so little interest. I shall not forget Herodes and Mettius, and everything, which I can but suspect will be agreeable to you. O disgraceful son of your sister! He arrived as I was writing this, about sunset, while we were at dinner.

LETTER XXVIII.

As I wrote you word yesterday, I have settled to get to Puteolanum¹ on the 7th. There I shall hope to hear daily from you, especially upon the subject of the games; of which you must also send an account to Brutus. I sent you yesterday a copy of a letter I had from him, which I was hardly able to understand². Make my excuses to my Attica, so that all the blame may rest upon you; and assure her that I have by no means "brought away with me all my affection."³

LETTER XXIX.

I SEND you Brutus's letter¹. Good gods! What a want of resource! You will see when you

⁵ He might perhaps have sent her no message by Atticus.

¹ I have taken the liberty of inserting this word in the place of "Tusculanum," which is found in all the editions. The alteration is very slight, and amply warranted by tracing Cicero's progress from the evidence of his other letters. For he appears to have gone from Puteoli on the 30th of June [letter 25 of this book] to Arpinum July 2 [letter 26], and thence to Tusculanum July 3 [letter 28], where he took leave of Atticus [letter 27], and from whence we find him at Formiæ July 6 [letter 29] on his way back to Puteoli July 7 [book xvi. letter 1], where he was to embark.

² See letter 26 of this book.

³ It is said letter 26 of this book that Brutus' sentiments incline "sometimes one way, sometimes another;" so that here we are to understand Cicero as hardly knowing what conclusion to draw respecting the measures he would pursue. The same meaning is attached to the word interpretari in letter 19 of this book.

¹ The concluding expression may probably be copied from some letter of Attica's.

read it. Respecting the celebration of Brutus's games I agree with you. You need not go to M. Ælius's house; but speak to him¹ when you meet him. About the six per cent. from Tullius you may employ M. Axianus, as you mention. Your transaction with Cosianus is well managed; and it gives me pleasure to find that you attend to your own concerns as well as mine. I am glad my lieutenant² is approved. May the gods accomplish what you promise³! For what is there that I prefer to my friends? Though I have my fears about her⁴, whom you except. When I have seen Brutus, I will write you a full account. I wish it may be true about Plancus and Decimus⁵. I do not like Sextus's throwing away his shield⁶. Tell me if you know anything about Mundus. I have replied to all your observations; now hear mine. Quintus the son is come to conduct me to Puteoli. A famous citizen! you might call him Favonius, or Asinius. He did it for two reasons; to attend me, and to make his peace with Brutus and Cassius. But what say you? For I know you are well acquainted with the Othos. He says that he is going to take to himself Julia⁷: for a divorce is settled. His father asked me what was said of her. I replied, that I had heard nothing (for I did not know why he asked), excepting what related to her features, and to her parentage. But why? said I. Upon which he told me that his son wished to marry her. Then I, notwithstanding my abhorrence, yet said that I did not suppose the reports to be true. It is his object (for this is it) to give our nephew nothing. She will have him without regarding his father. I suspect however that the young man dreams as usual. But I should be glad if you would make inquiry, which you can easily do, and let me know.

I beseech you, what is this? After I had sealed my letter, some persons from Formiæ, who were dining with me, told me they had seen Plancus, him who is engaged about Buthrotum⁸, the day previous to my writing this, that is, on the 5th, dejected and without his trappings; and that the servants said, that he and his colonists⁹ had been turned out by the Buthrotians. Well done! But I beg you to write me an account of the whole business.

² See letter 11 of this book.

⁴ This may mean Pilia, or Attica, whose health might prevent them from travelling.

⁷ It is to be supposed that she was married to one of the Othos.

⁹ Those who came to take possession of the lands.

BOOK XVI.

LETTER I.

I ARRIVED at Puteolanum the 7th of July, and write this the following day on my way to Brutus at Neas¹. But while I was at dinner the day I got here, Eros delivered to me your letter. Is it so? In the edict for proclaiming the games, is the month, instead of Quintilis, called July, according to the new name given to it in honour of Cæsar²? May the gods confound those³ people! But we may storm the whole day. Can anything be more disgraceful than the adoption of the term "July" by Brutus? I turn therefore to my own duty, and "let us leave this," as it is said⁴, for I see no help. But pray, what is it I hear about the settlers of Buthrotum being cut to pieces⁵? And what is the meaning of Plancus's going in such haste (for so I heard) day and night? I want much to know the truth. I am very glad that my going is approved. It is no wonder if the Dymeans⁶, after being driven from their possessions, should infest the sea; but it does not follow that my staying here would be thought proper⁷. There may be some security in sailing in company with Brutus; but I apprehend his vessels are very small. However, I shall presently know, and will write to you to-morrow. I imagine it was a false alarm about Ventidius⁸. With regard to Sextus⁹, it is held for certain that he does not take up arms. If this is true, I see that without a civil war we are to be made slaves. How then? The first of January affords us hope in Pansa. Mere illusion! In the wine and indolence of these people? From the 210 sestertia¹⁰ (1680*l.*) Cicero's accounts may very well be liquidated. For Oivus is recently come from thence, and details many circumstances which give me pleasure. Among the rest this is not amiss, that he was authorised to assure me his allowance was amply sufficient; that 72 sestertia (580*l.*) were sufficient, fully and entirely; but that Xeno doled it out sparingly and reluctantly, that is, by little at a time. What you have transmitted beyond the rents of the houses¹¹, may be placed to that year, upon which fell the additional expense of his journey; and in future, dating from the first of April¹², let his allowance be raised to 80 sestertia (640*l.*); for the houses now produce so much. But it must be considered what should be done when he returns to Rome, for I do not think that mother-in-law¹³ can be tolerated. I rejected the proposal through the tall Pindarus¹⁴. Now hear for what purpose I have sent the messenger. Quintus the son promises me that he will be a very Cato; and both the father and the son have been urgent with me to commend him to you; yet so, that you might only give credit to him when you should be satisfied from your own knowledge. I shall give him a letter agreeable to his own wishes; but, that you may not be moved by it, I write this for the purpose of assuring you that I am not moved myself. The gods grant that he may fulfil what he promises! It would be a general joy. But I say no more. He sets out from hence the 9th. For he says there is an assignment for the 15th, and that he is severely pressed. You will regulate by my letter the manner in which you are to answer him. I will write more when I have seen Brutus, and send back Eros. I admit the excuse of my Attica, and love her dearly. My compliments to her and to Pilia.

LETTER II¹.

(Græc. v.)

BRUTUS is already expecting to hear from you. What I told him of Attius's "Tereus"² was not new; but he supposed it to have been the "Brutus".³ However, some rumour had reached him that the exhibition of the Grecian games⁴ had not been well

¹ A small island not far from Patsoi, where the younger Lucullus, a relation of Brutus, had a villa.

² In order to make this intelligible to the English reader, I have thought it necessary thus to paraphrase what in the original is contained in two words. I have throughout adopted the English dates; and in general the months have the same denominations in both languages; excepting that July and August used to be called Quintilis and Sextilis; till the first was altered in honour of Julius Cæsar a little before his death, the other afterwards in honour of Augustus.

³ The Cæsarian faction, by whom this date is supposed to have been inserted in the proclamation.

⁷ This seems to be the meaning; which a literal translation would hardly have conveyed.

⁹ Sextus Pompeius. See book xvi. letter 20.

¹⁰ This may perhaps be the sum borrowed, which, book xv. letter 20, was in round numbers called 200 sestertia.

¹¹ See book xii. letter 32.

¹⁴ Probably some freed-man of large stature belonging to this lady.

¹⁵ This is probably the letter which was taken by young Quintus, and which I have thought fit to place the second in this book, having apparently been written on the evening of July 8, after his visit to Brutus in company with young Quintus. The behaviour of both parties at that visit, may have given Cicero additional confidence in his nephew's professions; which afterwards proved to be sincere.

attended; which did not surprise me; for you know my opinion of them¹. Now hear what is better than all. Quintus has passed several days with me; and if I wished it, would even have staid longer: but, while he was here, you cannot believe how much he delighted me in every respect; particularly in that² wherein I was least satisfied. For he is so entirely changed by means of some writings which I had in hand, and by repeated conversation and instruction, that he will in future be disposed towards the republic as we could wish. Having not only assured me, but persuaded me of his sincerity, he has been very earnest with me to vouch to you for his conducting himself in a manner honourable both to you and to me. And he does not ask you immediately to trust him; but when you are thoroughly satisfied, then to give him your affection. Unless he had convinced me, and I had believed what I tell you to be certain, I should not have done what I am going to mention. For I took the young man with me to Brutus, who was so well satisfied with what I relate, that he gave full credit to it himself, and refused to accept me as a voucher; but commending him, spake most kindly of you; and upon taking leave of him, embraced and kissed him. Therefore, though I have more reason to congratulate you than to ask you, yet I do ask that if heretofore he appears to have been guilty of some indiscretions owing to the infirmity of youth, you will believe that he has renounced them; and trust me when I add, that your authority will have great, or rather the greatest, effect in confirming his resolution. Having several times thrown out to Brutus my design of sailing in his company, he did not seem to catch at it, as I had expected. I thought him absorbed; which indeed is the case, particularly on the subject of the games. But on my return home, Cn. Lucceius, who sees a great deal of Brutus, informed me that he delayed his voyage, not from irresolution, but waiting if any chance should arise. I therefore doubt whether I should go to Venusia, and there wait to hear about the troops. If they are not in the neighbourhood, as some suppose, I may go to Hydruntum. If neither³ is safe, I shall return to this place. Do you think I am jesting⁴? May I die if anybody keeps me besides you. For only look round—But I blush to say it before your face. How charmingly are the days pointed out in Lepidus's⁵ auspices; and how conveniently for the purpose of my return! I derive from your letter a great encouragement to set out. And I wish I may see you there⁶. But as you shall think most advantageous⁷. I am expecting Nepos's⁸ letter. Is he desirous to possess my writings, who considers as unfit to be read those subjects⁹ of which I am most proud? And you say, "after him, who is irreproachable"; but it is you who are "irreproachable," while he is "divine." There is no collection of my letters; but my Tiro has about seventy, and some may be got from you. These I must look over and correct, and then they shall be published¹⁰.

LETTER III.

(Græc. ii.)

ON the 10th I received two letters, one by my own messenger, the other by Brutus's. We had here a very different report respecting the Buthrarians. But to this among many other things we must submit. I send back Eros sooner than I had intended, that there may be somebody to attend to Hortensius; and also because he says he has made an appointment with the knights¹¹. Hortensius however is very unreasonable; for there is nothing owing to him excepting from the third instalment¹², which becomes due the 1st of August; and of this very instalment the greater part has been paid him some time before the day. But Eros will see about this on the 15th. In the case of Publius¹³, I think there ought to be no delay in making the proper assignment. Yet when you consider how far I have receded from my right, by paying at once 200 out of the 400 sestertia (3200*l.*) and giving a bill for the remainder, you may mention to him, if you please, that he ought to wait my convenience after the loss I have sustained in my just claims. But I entreat you, my dear Atticus, (do you observe how I coax?) as long as you remain in Rome, manage, regulate, govern all my concerns, without waiting to hear from me. For though the balance is quite sufficient to discharge all demands, yet it frequently happens that our own debtors are not punctual to their time. If anything of this sort should occur, let my credit be of the first consideration with you: so as to support it by borrowing, or even by selling, if circumstances render it necessary. Brutus was much pleased with your letter. For I was with him several hours in Nemi soon after I had received it. He seemed to be delighted with "Tereus," and to feel himself under greater obligation to Accius than to Antonius. For myself, the more I am pleased with the account, the more it excites my indignation and vexation, that the Roman people should employ their hands, not in defending the republic, but in applauding it.

³ It is to be supposed that Atticus had solicited him to publish a collection of his letters.

⁴ It is uncertain who are meant.

³ Neither Brundisium nor Hydruntum.

⁴ This may perhaps allude to some letter from Atticus adverting to book xv. letter 27, in which Cicero had expressed his concern at parting from him.

⁵ Lepidus was chief pontifex at this time; in which capacity he appointed the days for the augurs to take the auspices, and Cicero, it will be recollected, belonged to the college of augurs.

⁶ In Greece.

⁷ Meaning that he would not have Atticus go to his own inconvenience.

Cornelius Nepos, who had a great friendship with Atticus.

The minds of these men^a appear to be inflamed to such a pitch as to unmask their wickedness. But however, if they do but smart, let them smart for what they may^b. I am glad of what you say, that my determination^c is every day more approved; and was anxiously expecting what you might write to me about it; for I meet with a variety of opinions. Indeed it was on that account I protracted my stay, in order to leave it open as long as possible. But now that I am driven out with a pitchfork, I think of proceeding to Brundisium; for it will be easier and more practicable to avoid the troops^d than the pirates, who are reported to be seen abroad. Seestius was expected on the tenth^e, but he is not come, so far as I know. Cassius has arrived with his little fleet. As soon as I have seen him, I mean to go on the 11th^f to Pompeianum, thence to Acculanum, and so on. It is as I supposed about Tutia^g. The report of Ebutius^h I do not believe; I do not however care about it any more than you. I have written to Plancus and *Oppius*ⁱ because you desired me; but do not think it necessary to deliver the letters, unless you choose it. For after having done for you everything in their power, I am afraid they will think my recommendation superfluous; especially Oppius, whom I know to be entirely in your interests. But, as you like. Since you write word that you shall winter in Epirus, it will be a great kindness to me if you go thither before the time that I must by your advice return into Italy. Let me hear from you as often as possible; if about things of little moment, by any messenger you may find; but if there is anything of more importance, send somebody from your house. If I get safe to Brundisium, I shall set about my Heraclidean work; I have sent you the treatise upon Glory. You will keep it locked up, as usual; but let select passages be marked, which Salvius^k may read to your guests, when he has a good audience. These books please me much; I would rather hear that they pleased you. Again and again farewell.

LETTER IV.

(Græc. iii.)

You have done wisely (for I am now writing in answer to the letter which you sent me after meeting Antonius at Tibur). Wisely I say in giving way to him, and even being forward to ^a Antonius's party.^b The original is from Arantius—Tusc. Disp. iv. 20.^c Of going abroad.^d Which were expected from Macedonia to strengthen Antonius's army.^e The day on which Cicero writes.^f There seems to be no doubt that what is in the manuscripts v. Kal., should be v. Id.^g What this alludes to is not known.^h This is unknown.ⁱ On the subject of Buthrotum.^j After the manner of Heraclides. See book xv. letter 4.^k A freed-man of Atticus employed in his library, [see book xiii. letter 44,] and in reading to him during some part of his dinner; which Corn. Nepos informs us was his constant practice. It seems to have been a frequent practice not only among the ancient Greeks and Romans, but also in more recent times; and was probably only discontinued upon the easy acquirement of books consequent on the invention of printing.

thank him^l. For as you rightly observe, we can more easily bear the loss of our public rights than of our private ones. When you say that you are more and more pleased with "O Titus," &c.^m, you give me fresh spirits to write. In your expectation of seeing Eros, and not empty-handedⁿ, I am glad that you have not been disappointed. But what I have sent you is the same treatise retouched; and indeed it is the original itself in many places interpolated and amended. When it has been transcribed on large paper, you may read it in private to your guests. But as you love me, show yourself cheerful and entertain them well, lest they vent upon me the displeasure they may feel towards you^o. I wish that what I hear of Cicero may be true. I shall know about Xeno, when I am there^p; though I cannot suppose that he would do anything either inattentively or illiberally. Respecting Herodes, I will do as you desire; and what you mention, I will learn from Saufeus and Xeno. On the subject of Quintus the son, I am glad the letter^q, which I sent by my messenger, was delivered to you previously to that which he took himself; though you would not have been deceived. Nevertheless—But I am anxious to know what he said to you and you to him; yet I have no doubt that each behaved in his own manner. I hope to receive the account by Curius; who, amiable as he is himself and beloved by me, yet derives a great additional regard from your recommendation. I have replied to your letter. Now hear what I am persuaded is unnecessary to be written, but yet I write. Many considerations affect me on my departure, and most of all, that I am separated from you. Besides, I dislike the trouble of a voyage, unsuitable not only to my age, but also to my character. And the time of my departure has something absurd in it; for I leave a state of peace, to come back to war; and the interval that might be spent among my small estates, in convenient and sufficiently pleasant houses, I am going to waste in travelling. My consolation is that I shall either be of service to Cicero, or shall be able to judge what advantage is to be expected. Then you, as I hope, and as you promise, will presently be there. If this happens, everything will go better with me. But I am much vexed about the balance of my accounts. For though it is all clear, yet Dolabella's debt being entered among them, and his assignees total strangers to me, I feel anxious about it; so that among all my troubles nothing vexes me more. Therefore I do not think I have done wrong in having written to Balbus more openly, that if anything of the kind should happen, and the payments should not correspond, he might assist me; likewise in having desired you in the event of such an accident to communicate with him; which you will do if you see occasion, more especially if you go into Epirus. I write this on the point of embarking from Pompeianum with three small vessels of ten oars each. Brutus is still in Nesis, Cassius at Naples. Are you pleased with Deiotarus, and are you not pleased with Hieras?¹ who having been directed at the time that Blesamius came to me to do nothing without consulting our friend Sextus², made no communication to him nor to any of us. I long to kiss my Attica for the sweet salutation she sent me through you. You will return therefore my kindest compliments to her, and present them likewise to Pilia.

LETTER V.

(Græc. iv.)

As I told you in the letter you would receive yesterday or perhaps to-day (for Quintus³ said the next day), I went to Nesis the 8th. Brutus was there. How he was vexed about the 7th of July!⁴ He was wonderfully disturbed, and said that he should write to desire that the fights with the wild beasts, which were to take place the day after the Apollinary games, might be proclaimed for the 13th of Quintilis. Libo came in and said that Philo, Pompeius's freed-man, and his own freed-man Hilarus, had arrived from Sextus⁵ with a letter to the consuls, or whatever else they are to be called⁶. He read us a copy of it. I said what I thought, that some few things were irrelevant; but otherwise it was sufficiently dignified and not disrespectful. I only wanted to have added that what was inscribed to the consuls alone, should have been to the prætors, tribunes of the people and senate, lest they should not produce what had been sent to themselves. They say that Sextus was at Carthagena with only one legion; and that he received the account of Cæsar the very day on which he had taken the town of Borea; that after taking the town there was a wonderful expression of joy, a change in men's minds, and a concourse from all parts; but that he returned to the six legions which he had left in the further part of Spain. To Libo himself however he wrote word that there could be no accommodation unless he were permitted to resume his own⁷ house. The sum of his demands was, that all the armies should be dismissed wherever they might be. So much for Sextus. Respecting the Buthrotians, after every inquiry I hear nothing certain. Some report that the settlers were cut to pieces; some, that Plancus, upon receiving a sum of money, had run away and left them. So that I do not see how I can ascertain what the truth of it is, unless you presently write to me. The going to Brundisium, about which I doubted, seems to be at an end; for the legions⁸ are said to be approaching. But this voyage⁹ has some suspicion of danger. Therefore I determined to sail in company with Brutus. I found him better prepared than I had understood. For Domitius¹⁰ has himself some good vessels; and there are besides some distinguished ones belonging to Sestius, Bucilianus, and others. For upon Cassius's fleet, which is quite a fine one, I cannot reckon beyond the straits¹¹. It is rather unpleasant to me that Brutus seems to be so little inclined to hasten his voyage. He waits first to hear the issue of the games; and afterwards, as far as I can learn, means to proceed slowly and stop at several places. Yet I think it is better to sail slowly than not to sail at all; and if, when we have made some way, the passage appears clear¹², I shall take advantage of the Etesian winds¹³.

LETTER VI.

HITHERTO (for I am got as far as Sica's at Vibos¹⁴) I have sailed rather conveniently than expeditiously; for a great part of the way has been performed by rowing; there being none of the winds which usually precede the Etesian. It happened also very opportunely that we passed over the two bays of Paestum and Vibos, which must be passed with an even course¹⁵. I got to Sica's the eighth day after I left Pompeianum, having stayed one day at Velia, where I was much at my ease at my friend Thalno's. I could not have been received more hospitably, especially in his absence. I arrived at Sica's on the 24th, where I was quite at home; therefore I stayed over the next day. But I mean when I get to Rhegium, before I undertake my longer passage, to consider whether I shall go in a heavy vessel to Patras, or in a light one to the Tarentine Leucopetra¹⁶, and from thence to Corcyra; and if I go in a ship of burden, whether I shall at once cross over from the straits or go by way of Syracuse. Upon this subject I will write to you from Rhegium. In truth, my Atticus, I often ask myself what is the purpose of this voyage? Why am I not with you? Why am I not visiting my own villas, those dear spots of Italy? But it is enough, and more than enough, to be away from you. And from what am I fleeing? From danger? At present, unless I am mistaken, there is none; but to this very danger your authority calls me back. For you write word that my going is applauded to the skies; but on condition that I return before the first of January, which I certainly shall endeavour to do. For I would rather be at home even with the apprehension of danger, than in perfect security at your Athens. But see how things are likely to go; and either write to me, or, what I should like much better, bring me word yourself. So much for this. I hope you will take it in good part, if I urge you to a thing, in which I am persuaded you already take more interest than I do myself. Clear up, I entreat you, and settle my accounts. I left a fair balance; but there is need of some exertion, that my co-heirs may be paid in full for the Cluvian estate^g on the first of August. You will see what is to be done with Publius. He ought not to press me, since I do not avail myself of my right; yet I wish him also to be fully satisfied. But what shall I say to Terentia? Her I would have you pay even before it is due, if you can. But if, as I hope, you will quickly go to Epirus, I request you previously to provide for the entire extrication and discharge of this debt, for which I am pledged. But enough of these affairs; I am afraid you will think it too much. Now hear my negligence. I sent you my treatise on Glory; but it has the same preface as that to the third book of the Academics. It arose from hence, that I have a whole volume of prefaces, from which I am in the habit of selecting one when I begin any new composition. So lately in Tusculanum, not recollecting that I had before used that preface, I introduced it into the book which I sent you. But upon reading over the Academics in the ship, I found out my error. I therefore immediately wrote a new preface, which I have sent you. You will accordingly cut off the former, and glue on this^h. Give my compliments to Pilia, and to Attica, my delight and darling.

⁷ I have supposed with some commentators that the original ought to be written pedibus æquis, and I understand it to mean that the ropes, which fastened the sails on each side, were equally stretched, so that the ship passed with an even course. It is well known that the word pedes is applied to many different things. So Homer in the construction of Ulysses' ship, ῥέδας τ' ἐρέδοντες ἐν ἀβρίῃ.—Od. v. 260.

⁸ There seems reason to believe this may be the same as Leuca, near Hydruntum, the word Tarentine being added to distinguish it from another place of the same name near Rhegium, of which mention is made in the next letter.

LETTER VII.

On the 6th of August, having set out from Leucopetraⁱ, from whence I meant to pass over to Greece, when I had proceeded about forty miles I was driven back by a violent south wind to the same port of Leucopetra. There while I was waiting for a fair wind, at the house of my friend Valerius, so that I was altogether at my ease and very comfortable, there arrived some Rhegians of distinction, who had recently come from Rome,—and among them one who had been staying with our Brutus at Naples. They brought with them the proclamation of Brutus and Cassius, and said there was to be a full senate on the 1st of September, and that Brutus and Cassius had written to the ^g See letter 3 of this book.

^h These expressions show the way practised by the ancient Romans in regard to their books, which consisted of a long scroll of parchment divided transversely into pages, and fixed upon rollers.

ⁱ It appears by the first Philippic that Cicero passed over from Leucopetra near Rhegium to Syracuse, August 1, and the day following set sail for Greece, but was driven back to Leucopetra. Hence he made a second attempt to cross the sea to Greece, but was again obliged to return.

consular and prætorian members to request their attendance. They reported that great hope was entertained of Antonius's giving way, of some accommodation, and of our friends' returning to Rome. They added also that my absence was regretted, and in some degree blamed. Upon hearing this, I did not hesitate to lay aside all thoughts of my voyage, which, to say the truth, I never much liked: but when I read your letter I confess I was surprised that you should so vehemently have changed your opinion,—though I concluded it was not without good reason. Yet if you were not the adviser and promoter of my going, at least you were an approver of it provided I returned to Rome by the 1st of January. Thus I should have been away, while the danger was likely to be less, and should have come into the very flame. But if this was not so prudent, I have however no cause to be displeased; for in the first place it was done by my own judgment; and in the next place, even if it had been by your advice, what is expected of one who gives advice, besides integrity? I cannot sufficiently wonder at the following expressions in your letter:—"Come then, you who prefer an honourable death^j, come; will you desert your country?" Did I desert it? Or did I then appear to you to desert it? You not only did not prevent it, but you even approved of it. The rest was still more severe; "I wish you would draw up for me some note to prove that you have done right." So then, my Atticus, does my conduct stand in need of defence, especially before you who so strongly approved it? Yes, I will compose an apology; but it shall be to some one of those who disliked and dissuaded my going. Though what need now of "a note?" If I had persevered there might have been need: but this very want of consistency may be objected to me. No philosopher, among the many things that have been written on questions of this kind, ever called a change of opinion by the name of inconsistency. Afterwards you go on thus: "for if this had been done by my friend Phædrus^k, there would be a ready excuse; but what are we to say now?" So then, what I have done is of such a nature that I cannot approve it to Cato^l, being full of guilt and infamy. I wish it had appeared so to you from the beginning; you should have been my Cato, as you always are. This last is the most galling of all; "for our Brutus says nothing;" that is, he does not venture to admonish a person of my age. I can put no other interpretation on these words; and assuredly so it is: for on the 16th of August, when I had arrived at Velia, Brutus heard of it, being with his ship off the river Heles, three miles east of Velia. He immediately came on foot to me. Immortal gods! What satisfaction did he show at my return, or rather my coming back! He then poured forth everything that he had suppressed,—so as to make me recollect that expression of yours, "for our Brutus says nothing." He particularly regretted my absence from the senate on the 1st of August. Piso he extolled to the skies. He said that he was glad that I had avoided two heavy imputations; one of despondency and desertion of the republic, which I was aware that I incurred by going away,—for many with tears uttered their complaints before me, and would not be persuaded of my speedy return; the other, upon which Brutus and those who were with him (and they were a good many) expressed their joy, that I had avoided the imputation of being supposed to go to the Olympic Games. Nothing could have been more disreputable than this at any period of the republic,—and at this period quite inexcusable. But I cordially thank the south wind, which has saved me from this disgrace. You have here plausible reasons for my coming back, and reasons which are at the same time just and ample: yet there can be no juster reason than what you mention yourself in another letter,—“if there is anything owing to anybody take care to provide some source from whence an equivalent may be drawn; for the apprehension of war has produced a wonderful difficulty in raising money.” This letter I read in the middle of the straits; and no means of providing this occurred to me but by coming up to my own support. But enough of this; the rest when we meet. Brutus has shown me Antonius’s proclamation, and their reply, which is admirably drawn up. But I really do not see what effect these proclamations can have, or what is their object; nor am I now, as Brutus imagined, going thither to take any part in public affairs. For what can be done? Has anybody seconded Piso? Did he himself return again the next day? But they say that at my age one ought not to be at a great distance from his grave*. But pray what is this which I hear from Brutus? He said you had written word that Pilia had suffered an attack of palsy. I am exceedingly concerned,—though at the same time he added that you hoped she was better. I earnestly wish it. Present my best compliments to her, and to sweetest Attica. I write this on board, approaching to Pompeianum, on the 19th.

LETTER VIII.

WHEN I know what day I shall arrive^a, I will let you know. I must wait for my heavy goods, which are coming from Anagnia; besides which, several of my family are sick. On the evening of the first^b I received a letter from Octavianus. He is attempting great things: he has gained over to his party all the veterans who are at Casilinum and Calatia^c,—and no wonder; for he gives a bounty

^a That is, it is right for me to be near Rome, where I must soon expect to be buried.

^b At Rome. In the interval between the time of writing the preceding letter and this, Cicero had gone up to Rome, where he arrived August 31, and was received with great compliments and congratulations. The following day, Sept. 1, he was solicited by Antonius to attend the senate; but excused himself on the pretence of fatigue; but really because he knew it was fruitless to resist the proposal of Antonius to decree divine honours to Caesar. Antonius in rage threatened to pull down his house. Thereupon, on Sept. 2, Cicero pronounced his first Philippic against Antonius; and before the end of the month he retired to the neighbourhood of Naples, where he composed his second Philippic, distinguished for the free exposure of Antonius’s character. He still continued in the same neighbourhood when he wrote the present letter in the month of November.

of 500 denarii (16*l.*). He thinks of going through the other colonies. He plainly aims at making himself the head of an army to be brought against Antonius. Accordingly, I see that in a few days we shall be in arms. Whom then should I follow? Consider his name^a, consider his age; and he requests to have first some conversation with me secretly either at Capua or not far from Capua. But it is childish to suppose that this can be done secretly. I informed him by letter that this was neither necessary nor possible to be done. He sent to me one Camsina of Volaterra, a friend of his, who brought word that Antonius was advancing towards Rome with the legion of Alaudans^b,—that he demanded contributions from all the free towns,—and was conducting a legion^c with military ensigns. He consulted me whether he should march to Rome with 3000 veterans, or should maintain the post of Capua, and prevent Antonius’s approach,—or should go to meet the three Macedonian legions which are advancing along the upper coast, and which he hopes are in his interest. They refused to receive Antonius’s bounty, as this person relates,—and bitterly insulted him, and left him whilst he was haranguing them. In short, he^d assumes the command, and thinks that I ought to support him. I, for my part, advised him to go to Rome; for I thought he would have with him both the city populace, and, if he could gain their confidence, likewise the most respectable citizens. O Brutus, where are you? What a fine opportunity^e do you lose! I did not foresee exactly this; but I fully expected something of the kind. Now I want your counsel. Shall I go to Rome? or shall I remain where I am^f? or shall I retire to Arpinum? For that place possesses great security. To Rome I think; in case I should be wanted if anything decisive occurs. Resolve me this, therefore: I never was in greater perplexity.

LETTER IX.

I RECEIVED two letters in one day from Octavius. He now wants me to go immediately to Rome, and says that he is desirous of acting by the authority of the senate; to which I replied, that the senate could not meet before the first of January, which I believe to be the case^a. But then he adds, “by your advice.” In short, he presses hard, and I try to excuse myself. I cannot trust his youth; I do not know his real intentions; I do not care to do anything without your friend Pansa^b. I am afraid of Antonius’s power, and unwilling to go from the coast⁷, and at the same time should be sorry to be out of the way upon any great occasion. The proceeding of this young man displeases Varro more than me. He has steady troops; he may have Brutus⁸; and he acts openly, arranging and mustering his army at Capua. Already I see war. Write in answer to this. I am surprised that my messenger should have left Rome on the first without a letter from you.

LETTER X.

I ARRIVED at my house in Sinuessa the 7th of November⁹; and it was generally reported that Antonius was to sleep at Casilinum the same day; which made me alter my plans. For I had intended to go straight to Rome by the Appian road, in which case he would easily have overtaken me; for they say that he travels with the speed of Cæsar¹⁰. I therefore turned aside from Minturnæ towards Arpinum, with the design of sleeping on the 9th¹¹ either at Aquinum, or in Arcanum. Now, my Atticus, enter into my present concern with your whole mind, for it is a thing of great moment. There are three parties to choose: whether I should remain at Arpinum, or should approach nearer, or should go to Rome. Whatever you advise I will do. But as soon as possible. I anxiously look for a letter from you. The 8th, in the morning at Sinuessanum.

LETTER XI.

ON the 5th¹² I received two letters from you, one dated the 1st of this month, the other the day before. First then for the earliest. I am glad that you approve of my work¹³; wherein the brilliant passages which you have selected derive additional brilliancy from your judgment; for I was afraid of those little red¹⁴ marks of yours. Your observation about Sica¹⁵ is very just; but it is with difficulty that I restrain myself. I will however mention it without any disrespect to Sica or to Septimia; only so, that children's children may know, without any Lucilian fence¹⁶, that he has had children by the daughter of C. Fadius. And I shall be glad to see the day when this speech may circulate so freely as to find its way even into Sica's house. But we have need of that time, when those¹⁷ triumvirs lived. May I die if it is not wittily said. I would have you read it¹⁸ to Sextus, and tell me what he thinks of it. He alone is as good as ten thousand to me. But take care that Calenus and Calvena¹⁹ do not come in. When you say you are afraid of tiring me, you tire me? Nobody less. For as Aristophanes said of Archilochus's Iambics²⁰, so may I of your letters, that I like the longest the best. But you are advising me. Even if you were finding fault with me, I should not only bear it patiently, but should be pleased, as long as good sense and kindness are mingled with reproof. Accordingly I shall readily adopt your corrections, and put "the same right as Rubrius's," instead of "as Scipio's;" and in the matter of Dolabella's praises I will lessen their heap. Yet I think there is in that place a fine irony, when I represent him to have been in three engagements against Roman citizens. I like better too that expression, "it is most unfit that this man should live," than, "what is more unfit?" I am glad you like Varro's Peperographia. I have not yet got from him that Heraclidean work. In exhorting me to write, you show your friendship; but let me assure you that I do nothing else. I am sorry for your cold, and beg you to apply to it your usual attention. I rejoice to think that "O Titus"²¹ has been of use to you. The Anagnians²² are, Mustella the captain of the gladiators, and Læco, who is a great drinker. I will polish up, and send you the book you desire. What follows is in reply to the latter of the two letters. The treatise on Duties, as far as Panætius has gone, I have comprised in two books. There are three of his. But having in the beginning divided the consideration of duties into three kinds; one, when we deliberate whether anything is honourable or base; the second, whether it is useful or prejudicial; the third, how we are to judge when these clash together (as in the case of Regulus²³, it was honourable to return, and useful to remain); he has treated admirably of the two first; respecting the third he promises hereafter, but has written nothing. The subject has been prosecuted by Posidonius, whose book I have sent for; and have written to Athenodorus Calvus to give me the heads of it, which I am expecting. I wish you would urge him, and request him to do it as quickly as he can. In this is treated of duties under particular circumstances. With regard to the title, I have no doubt of καθήκον being duty, unless you have anything to say to the contrary. But "of duties," is a fuller title. And I address my son Cicero, which seemed not unsuitable. Nothing can be more clear than your account of Myrtillus¹. How poignant are your observations on these people! Is it thus against D. Brutus? The gods confound them! I have not busied myself in Pompeianum, as I proposed; first, on account of the weather, than which nothing can be worse; then, I have every day a letter from Octavianus, begging me to undertake the conduct of affairs, to come to Capua a second time to save the republic, at all events to go immediately to Rome. "They were ashamed to refuse, and afraid to venture²." He has however acted and still acts strenuously: and will bring a strong force with him to Rome; but he is a mere boy. He thinks the senate may be assembled immediately. But who will attend? Or, if he does, who in this uncertain state of affairs will choose to offend Antonius? On the 1st of January he may perhaps afford protection; or things may come to a crisis before. The free towns are wonderfully inclined towards the boy. For on his way to Samnium he came to Cales, and slept at Theanus's. The greeting and exhortation was surprising. Would you have thought it? On this account I shall go to Rome sooner than I had intended. As soon as I have fixed the time, I will write. Though I have not read the conditions (for Eros has not arrived), yet I shall be glad if you will conclude the business³ on the twelfth. I shall be better able to write to Catina⁴, Tauromenium and Syracuse, if Valerius the interpreter sends me the names of those in power; for they change at different times, and my own acquaintance are mostly dead. I have written a public letter, if Valerius will make use of it; else he must send me the names. Balbus has written to me about the holidays set forth by Lepidus⁵. I shall wait till the 29th, and hope to hear from you. And by that time I expect to know the event of Torquatus's business⁶. I send you a letter from Quintus⁷, that you may see how much he loves him⁸, whom he is sorry you should love so little. Give Attica a kiss for me on account of her cheerfulness, which is the best sign in children. Farewell.

¹⁷ This is apparently copied from some letter of Atticus. But what three people or what time is meant is uncertain. A. Gellius mentions that Nevius, a writer of plays, had animadverted so freely upon some leading persons, as to have been cast into prison by certain triumvirs; but I know not if this can be the circumstance intended.—Aul. Gell. lib. 3.

I SEND you the copy of a letter I have received from Oppius, because it shows his kindness. Respecting Ocella⁹, while you hesitate and send me no answer, I have adopted a counsel of my own, and think of going to Rome on the 12th. I considered that it was better for me to be there to no purpose, at a time when it was not necessary, than, if I should be wanted, to be absent. Besides, I have some fear of being intercepted; for he may arrive presently; though there are various reports, and some that I should like to have verified. But there is nothing certain. Yet whatever happens, I would rather be with you than remain at a distance, in anxiety both about you and about myself. But what can I say to you? Be of good courage¹¹. This is a lively sally¹² on the subject of Varro's Heracleidum. Nothing ever amused me so much. But of this and other greater matters when we meet.

LETTER XIII.

WHAT a strange chance! On the 8th having left Sinuessanum before it was light, and got by the dawn of day as far as the Tirene bridge at Minturnæ, where the road turns to Arpinas, I met the messenger just as I was "entering upon my long course." I immediately cried out, "If you have anything from Atticus, give it me." But I was not yet able to read; for I had sent away the torches, and the light was insufficient. But as soon as I could see, I first began to read the former of your two letters. It is elegant beyond everything. As I hope to be saved, I say nothing different from what I feel. I never read anything more kind. I will come then whither you call me, provided you assist me. But at first I thought nothing could be so irrelative to that letter, in which I had asked for your advice, as this answer; till I found another, in which you direct me, in the words of Homer, "to pass by the stormy Minæ¹³ to the island of Psylra¹⁴, keeping the Applan¹⁵ road on the left." That day then I slept at Aquinum, rather a long journey, and a bad road: I deliver this as I am setting out from thence the next morning¹⁶.

take a letter. It is difficult, at this distance, to answer your inquiry, what I think you ought to do. However, if they^a are upon an equality with each other, it will be best to remain quiet. But if¹,—the mischief will spread, first to us¹, then generally. I eagerly expect your advice. I am afraid of being absent when I ought to be there, and yet I dare not go up. Of Antonius's movements I now hear something different from what I mentioned. I wish you therefore to explain everything, and let me know the truth. For the rest, what can I say to you? I am inflamed with the love of history¹. For your encouragement stimulates me beyond belief. But it can neither be entered upon nor effected without your assistance. We will therefore consider of it together when we meet. At present I wish you would send me word, under what censors C. Fannius, the son of Marcus, was tribune of the people. For I seem to have heard that it was under P. Africanus and L. Mummius, and want to know if it is so. Send me a true and clear account of every change that happens. From Arpinas, the 11th¹.

LETTER XV.

(Græc. xiv.)

I HAVE positively nothing to tell you. While I remained at Puteoli there was every day something new about Octavianus, and many false reports of Antonius. But in answer to what you mention, (for I received three letters from you on the 11th,) I perfectly agree with you. If Octavianus acquires influence, the acts of the tyrant will be established much more firmly than in the temple of Tellus^a, which will be unfavourable for Brutus. But if he is beaten, you see how insupportable Antonius will be. So that it is difficult to choose between them. O this sad fellow, Sextus's messenger! He promised to be at Rome the day after he left Puteoli. When you admonish me to proceed gently, I assent, though I think differently from you. Neither Philippus nor Marcellus^a have any weight with me; for theirs is a different case; or if it is not, at least it appears to be so^a. But this young man, though he does not want spirit, wants authority. However, if I can prudently be at Tusculanum, consider whether that or this^a would be better when Antonius arrives. I shall be there with more satisfaction, because I shall know all that takes place. But, to pass from one subject to another, I have no doubt that what the Greeks call καθήκον, we call "duty." Why should you doubt about its being rightly applied to the state? Do we not say "the duty of the consuls?" "the duty of the senate?" It suits admirably; or give me a better word. This is sad intelligence about Nepos' son. In truth I am much concerned, and sorry for it. I did not know that there had been such a boy. I have lost Caninius, a man, as far as regards me, always very kind. There is no occasion for your speaking to Athenodorus^a, for he has sent me a very handsome abstract. Pray take every precaution about your cold. Quintus, the great-grandson of your grandfather, has written to my father's grandson^a, that after the 5th of that month on which I distinguished myself^a, he will lay open the state of the temple of Ops^a, and that before the people. You will see, therefore, and write me word. I am anxious to know Sextus's opinion^a.

LETTER XVI.

(Græc. xv.)

Do not suppose it is from indolence that I decline writing with my own hand; yet in truth it is from indolence, for I have nothing else to allege. However, in your letters likewise I think I can trace Alexis^a. But to come to my purpose: if Dolabella had not used me shamefully, I might perhaps have doubted whether I ought to relax or to contend for my utmost right. But now I am even glad that an opportunity is offered to me, by which he and everybody else may know that I have withdrawn my affection from him; and I may publicly declare, that, both on my own account, and that of the republic, I hold him in aversion. For after having at my instance undertaken the defence of the republic, he has not only been bribed with money to desert it, but, as far as was in his power, he has contributed to ruin it. In answer to your question, how I mean to proceed when the day^a arrives: in the first place I should like it to be so, that there may be no impropriety in my being at Rome; about which, as about everything else, I will do as you think right. But upon the whole, I am disposed to act vigorously and sternly. And though it may seem to be in some measure discreditable to call upon the sureties, yet I would have you take this under your consideration; for I may introduce agents for this purpose; and the sureties will not resist the claim. Upon this I am confident the sureties will be released. But I think it will be disgraceful in him^a, especially as he has pledged himself in the debt, not to redeem his agents; and it becomes my own character to prosecute my right without exposing him to extreme ignominy. I should be glad if you would inform me what is your opinion about this; and doubt not but you will be able to settle the whole in some gentler manner. I come now to the republic. I have on many occasions experienced your prudence in political matters; but nothing was ever more prudent than the observation contained in your last letter. "For though at present this boy nobly resists Antonius, yet we must wait for the issue hereafter."⁷ Yet what an harangue? For it has been sent to me. He swears "by the hope of attaining his father's honours";⁸ and at the same time extends his hand towards the statue.⁹ But let me not owe my safety to one like him.¹⁰ As you say, however, the surest test will be the tribunate of our friend Casca;¹¹ about which I told Oppius, when he was exhorting me to support the young man, and his whole cause, and band of veteran soldiers, that I could by no means do it, till I should be satisfied that he would not only not be an enemy to the tyrannicides, but would even be a friend to them. Upon his assurance that he would be so, why, said I, should we be in a hurry? For I can be of no use to him before the 1st of January;¹² and we shall see his intentions before the middle of December in the case of Casca. He readily assented. So much, then, for this. I have only to add, that you shall have messengers every day; and I imagine you will every day also have something to tell me. I send you a copy of Lepta's letter, by which that Stratyllax¹³ appears to me crest-fallen. But you will read it, and judge for yourself.

After I had sealed my letter, I received yours and Sextus's.¹⁴ Nothing could be more agreeable or more friendly than Sextus's letter. For yours was very short, having written so fully before. It is indeed with prudence and kindness that you advise me to remain in this neighbourhood, till I hear the event of the present commotions. But, my Atticus, the republic does not at this time affect me. Not that anything is or ought to be dearer to me; but even Hippocrates forbids giving medicine when all hope is past. Therefore I lay aside such considerations. It is for my private affairs that I am now concerned. Say I so? Yes, for my reputation. For though there is so great a balance, yet I have not actually received enough to pay Terentia's.¹⁵ Terentia do I say? You know that some time ago I engaged to pay twenty-five sestertii (200*l.*) on the part of Montanus.¹⁶ Cicero had very modestly requested this on his own faith. I promised with all readiness, which you also approved, and desired Eros to set apart a sum for that purpose. He has not only not done it, but Aurelius¹ has been under the necessity of borrowing at a most exorbitant interest. Respecting the debt to Terentia, Tiro wrote me word that you said the money would accrue from Dolabella. I suppose he understood wrong, if anybody understands wrong; rather, he did not understand at all. For you sent me Coccinius's² answer, as Eros did, almost in the same words. I must therefore come up into the very flame of civil commotion. For it is better to fall publicly than privately. To the other subjects, upon which you so sweetly write to me, in my present disturbed state of mind I am unable to reply as I used to do. Let me first extricate myself from this care which presses me. Some means of doing this occur to me; but I can come to no certain determination till I have seen you. But why cannot I be in Rome with as much propriety as Marcellus? This, however, is not the question, nor do I much care about it. You see what it is that I care about; and I shall accordingly go up.

LETTER XVII.

(Græc. xvi.)

I HAVE read your very agreeable letter; and send you a copy of what I have written to Plancus. I shall know from Tiro what passed between them. You will be able to give more attention to your sister when you cease to be occupied with this affair.³

Presently after the conclusion of the above correspondence Cicero went up to Rome, where he used every exertion to rouse the people, the senate, the provincial governors, to support the cause of the republic. Octavius at first joined the republican armies against Antonius; but afterwards uniting with Antonius and Lepidus, formed that triumvirate, which extinguished the dying liberties of Rome. Having secured the military by promises, they proceeded to act without control, and to proscribe all who were offensive to them. Among these was Cicero, who was at that time at Tusculanum; but thereupon he fled to Astura, and embarking there went along the coast to Formianum. Thence he was going again towards the shore to re-embark, when he was overtaken and killed, having ordered his servants to make no resistance. This happened twelve months after he had gone up to Rome, when he had nearly completed his 64th year.

³ The affair of the Buthrotians. There is reason to believe this short letter is misplaced in point of time; and that it, with those which are thrown together in the Appendix, belongs to the same period as the others contained in book xv. and beginning of book xvi. relative to Buthrotum.

APPENDIX.

LETTER I.

M. Cicero to L. Plancus, Prætor elect.

I know the great regard you bear to my friend Atticus, and to me your zeal is such, that in truth I consider myself to have few equally attentive and affectionate. For to the great, and long, and just friendship between our families, a great accession has been made by your disposition towards me, and mine towards you, equal and mutual. The case of Buthrotum is not unknown to you; for I have often conversed with you about it, and detailed the whole affair to you. It happened in this manner:—As soon as we found that the Buthrotian land was proscribed, Atticus became alarmed, and drew up a statement, which he gave me to present to Cæsar; for I was to dine with him that day. I gave Cæsar the statement; and he approved the cause, and wrote back to Atticus, that what he asked was very just; but at the same time reminded him, that the Buthrotians must pay the remainder of the money at the time appointed. Atticus, who was anxious to save the city, paid the money out of his own property. Upon this we went to Cæsar, and spoke in behalf of the Buthrotians, and brought back a most liberal decree, signed by persons of the first distinction. After this had been done, I confess I was surprised that Cæsar should permit the assembling of those who wished for the Buthrotian land; and should not only permit it, but should appoint you to superintend that business. Accordingly I spoke to him, and that repeatedly, so that he even accused me of want of confidence in his word. He likewise bid M. Messala, and Atticus himself, lay aside all apprehensions; and openly declared, that he was unwilling to offend the minds of the claimants, while they remained in Italy; (for, as you know, he affected popularity); but that, when they had crossed the sea, he would take care they should be settled in some other place. This passed during his life: but after the death of Cæsar, as soon as the consuls by a decree of the senate began to hear causes, this, which I have above written, was laid before them. They approved the cause without any hesitation, and said they would write to you. But I, my Plancus, though I do not doubt but the decree of the senate, and the law, and the decree of the consuls, and their letter, will have abundant authority with you, and am conscious that for Atticus's own sake you would wish it; yet in consideration of our acquaintance and mutual regard, I have taken upon me to request that of you, which your distinguished kindness and gentle disposition would of themselves induce you to grant, that what I am confident you would do of your own accord, you will for my honour's sake do readily, liberally, and quickly. There is nobody more friendly, or more agreeable, or dearer to me, than Atticus. Before, his property only was concerned, though that was to a large amount; now his reputation is likewise implicated; that what he gained by great solicitation and favour, both in the lifetime and after the death of Cæsar, he may effectually obtain by your assistance. Should this be granted by you, I would have you believe that I shall entertain such a sense of your kindness, as to consider myself under the greatest obligation. I shall make it a point to attend with zeal and diligence to whatever I think will please or interest you. Take care to preserve your health.

LETTER II.

Cicero to Plancus, Prætor elect.

I HAVE already petitioned you by letter in behalf of the Buthrotians; that, as their cause had been approved by the consuls, (who had legal authority to inquire, determine, and pass judgment on Cæsar's acts,) you would promote that object, and would relieve my Atticus (for whom I know your regard), and me, (who am not less earnest), from our present anxiety. For everything being at length arranged, after great care, and much exertion and trouble, it remains with you to enable us as soon as possible to put an end to our solicitude. And indeed I know your prudence to be such, that you must see what great confusion will arise, if those consular decrees, which have been made respecting Cæsar's acts, are not observed. On my part, though I disapprove many of Cæsar's decisions, (which was unavoidable among such a multiplicity of business), yet for peace and quiet's sake I think it right to support them; and I believe that you strenuously maintain the same opinion. But the purpose of my letter is not to persuade, but to ask. I ask you therefore, my Plancus, and beg you, with all the zeal and ardour of which I am capable, so to undertake, so to manage, so to conclude this whole affair, that what we have without any hesitation obtained from the consuls by the extreme goodness and justness of the cause, you will not only permit us to enjoy, but will take pleasure in it, considering the disposition you have often evinced towards Atticus, both in his presence and in mine. By so doing you will confer the greatest obligation on me, who have always been united to you both by inclination and family connexion. That you will do this, I ardently request of you again and again.

LETTER III.

Cicero to his Capito¹.

I NEVER expected to come before you as a suppliant; but am not sorry that an opportunity is offered me of making trial of your affection. You know my regard for Atticus. I beg you therefore to grant me this; forget, for my sake, the part he once took in behalf of a friend, your adversary, when his character was at stake. In the first place, it is becoming your humanity to pardon this; for everybody is bound to support his friends: then, if you love me (to say nothing of Atticus), grant this wholly to your Cicero, for whom you profess so much esteem; that what I have always believed, I may now fully know, the reality of your affection. After Cæsar by his decree (which I, with many persons of the first dignity, countersigned) had exempted the Buthrotians, and assured me that as soon as the claimants had crossed the sea he would write to assign them some other lands, it happened that he was suddenly cut off. Upon this, as you know, (for you were present when the consuls were appointed by a decree of the senate to take Cæsar's acts into consideration,) the business was put off to the 1st of June. The decree of the senate was confirmed by a law passed on the 2d of June, giving to the consuls the cognizance of those matters, which Cæsar had purposed, decreed, and enacted. The cause of the Buthrotians was laid before the consuls. Cæsar's decree was recited, and besides, several documents of Cæsar's were produced. The consuls by the judgment of their council decreed in favour of the Buthrotians, and appointed Plancus to carry it into execution. Now, my Capito (for I know the influence you possess wherever you are, especially with a man of Plancus's easiness and humanity,) strive, labour, or rather coax and persuade Plancus, who, I hope, is well disposed, to be still better disposed through your means. Indeed it seems to be a thing of such a kind, that without favour to anybody, Plancus would of himself, agreeably to his own disposition and prudence, not hesitate to maintain the decree of the consuls, to whom the inquiry and determination was referred both by the law and by the decree of the senate: especially as, if this sort of cognizance were invalidated, the acts of Cæsar would seem to be called in question; which not only those who are interested, but also those who disapprove them wish, for tranquillity's sake, to confirm. Nevertheless, it is of consequence to me that Plancus should do this cheerfully and freely, which he certainly will if you exert that gentle spirit which I have often experienced, and that sweetness, in which nobody equals you. I earnestly request you to do so.

LETTER IV.

Cicero to C. Cupiennius.

I HAD a great esteem for your father, and he always showed me extraordinary attention and kindness; nor indeed have I ever doubted of your affection towards me. I, on my part, have not been deficient in cultivating it. I therefore request of you the more urgently to aid the city of Buthrotum, and to exert your influence that our friend Plancus may lose no time in confirming and carrying into effect the decree of the consuls, which they made in favour of the Buthrotians, agreeably to the authority given them both by the law and by the decree of the senate. This, my Cupiennius, I earnestly request of you again and again.

LETTER V.

Cicero to Plancus, Prætor elect.

Excuse me, if after I have written to you in detail about the Buthrotians, I address you again upon the same subject. It is not, my Plancus, that I have any distrust either of your liberality, or of the friendship between us; but in an affair of such moment to my Atticus, (in which now even his reputation is concerned, that it may be seen he is able to secure that to which Cæsar consented, and which we, who were present at the decrees and rescripts of Cæsar, witnessed and countersigned,—especially as the whole power of execution rests with you); that, what the consuls decreed agreeably to the decrees and rescripts of Cæsar, I say not, you should execute, but should execute with zeal and readiness; this will be so grateful to me, that nothing can be more so. Though I hope that by the time you receive this the request I had made in a former letter may be already granted, yet I shall not cease to importune you, till I hear that it is done; to which I look forward with great hope. Then I trust I shall write in a different strain, and shall have to return you thanks for your importunate favour. Should this be conferred, I would have you believe not so much that Atticus, (who is deeply interested), as that I (who am not less earnest than he) shall be obliged by it. Farewell.

LETTER VI.

Cicero to Capito.

I DOUBT not you will be surprised, and even displeased, that I should address you again upon the same subject; but an affair is at issue of great moment to Atticus, my intimate friend, to whom I am bound by every tie. I know your zeal for your friends, and theirs too for you, and it is in your power to render me essential service with Plancus. I am well acquainted with your kindness, and know the influence you have with your friends. Nobody can do us more service, on this occasion, than you. And the cause is as good as one ought to be which the consuls have decreed on the judgment of the council, having taken cognizance of it agreeably to the law and the decree of the senate. But I consider everything to rest in the liberality of your friend Plancus; who I think, while for your friendship's sake, and for the republic's sake, he will carry into effect the decree of the consuls, so for my sake will be glad to do it. Assist me then, my Capito; for which again and again I earnestly entreat you. Farewell.
